When the gentleman from Connecticut states that the committee worked hard, he stated the truth, and when he stated that the chairman of the committee had been hard driven he sated the truth. It has been a big task, and for one I take my hat off to the chairman of the committee for the manner in which he has stood up under the pressure exerted upon him from all sides. At the same time I do not think we should belittle the concern that a very, very large number of people scattered all over the country have felt about this measure, and I think we can get a better understanding of this concern if we go back and look for a moment at the bill as it was originally introduced. It was a very different proposition than the one now confronting us.

The bill as originally introduced was not drawn under the auspices of the so-called "Roper committee", but by another group selected for the purpose, and the selection was not made by the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. That first bill was calculated to throw fear not only into the minds of brokers and dealers and those engaged in the marketing of securities, but into the minds of bankers and security owners all over the country, and those who are responsible for the management of great business enterprises. I think we ought to review for just a moment some of the things which that bill proposed to do, in order that we may understand the fear that spread over the country and the actual harm that was done by the destruction of confidence. Of course, not all will agree with me in my criticism of the original proposal. But, for example, in the original bill the margin requirement was to be 60 percent. The best informed people in the United States, as we have encountered them, or at least as I have encountered them, were thoroughly convinced that if that provision were frozen in the law we would embark upon another painful period of deflation.

Various errors were committed, probably unintentionally. For example, the first bill forbade dealing in convertible bonds on the stock exchange. This happily has been corrected. The first bill, as I recollect, would have compelled the separation of the broker-dealer business, and in this event nearly every small broker in the country would have been driven out of business, because he would have been forbidden to do any business as a dealer. It was perfectly apparent that the small house cannot live, cannot command enough income unless it is permitted under proper regulation to do both kinds of business. That very provision is the one that started a great deal of this campaign of opposition to the bill as a whole, for if it had gone into effect literally thousands of employees in broker-dealer houses throughout the country would have lost their places.

Under the original bill it was not definitely clear that a State bond was to be put in the exempt class, as was provided for United States bonds or obligations. This, of course, caused concern at the seat of every State government and was of special concern to those who make a specialty of dealing in municipal and State bonds. Their number, of course, is very large. That needed clarification.

As to the reports to be required from corporations desiring to list their stocks, there were some extraordinary provisions in the first measure introduced, and, as though to cover everything in case anything should be forgotten, the Federal Trade SCommission was authorized to require any kind of report that it saw fit to ask for. Furthermore, the Commission was charged with the initial function of granting permission for the listing of the securities on the exchange. In other words, the exchanges, in the first place, would have nothing to say about the matter; the Commission alone would pass judgment on the proposal to list a given security. That very thing, with the extraordinary report required under the first draft of this measure, would have centered here in the Federal Trade Commission a very practical control over all the corporations in the country whose securities might be listed upon any exchange.

The same is true with respect to the first draft concerning the accounts or the method of keeping accounts which these same corporations might be required to adopt under orders from the Commission. As we all know, hundreds and hundreds of utilities must keep their accounts in accordance with the laws of the State in which they operate and under which they are regulated. To authorize a commission here in Washington to prescribe a different form of keeping accounts would, of course, impose a tremendous expense on those companies, and to no public benefit. Naturally, they were nervous. The keeping of accounts now under the various State laws is a highly expensive piece of business. Of course, it must be done, but most of these companies are having a hard enough time to get along, and any unnecessary or additional expense is something to be avoided. We cured that in the final redraft of the bill.

Then, as to the publicity of this information which the Commission was authorized under the previous draft to gather in, there was grave doubt as to the wisdom of the publicity section, because under a certain construction of this section the trade secrets and business practices of all these concerns might be given out to the public or made available to the public—practices and secrets which have nothing whatsoever to do with dealing in securities on stock exchanges. In the first draft the bill went so far beyond the mere regulation of stock exchanges that it is not surprising that it attracted national interest rather than simply so-called "Wall Street" interest.

My experience with those who have protested against certain provisions of this bill as originally introduced has been a very informing one.

I confess I knew nothing about the practices of stock exchanges, never having come in contact with them in a single instance. In the hearings, it is true, three fourths of the time was consumed by critics of the bill, but in nearly every instance those who criticized the bill expressed the hope we would get a good bill regulating the dealing in securities.

I remember very well that the representatives of the Curb Exchange came before the committee and pointed out that under the provisions of the bill as then drafted there was no question whatsoever but that the Curb Exchange in New York must close. Do you blame them for coming to us and protesting? This has been cured in the redraft.

I can also remember the original proxy provisions as contained in the bill first introduced. They provided, for example, that any person soliciting proxies from a shareholder in a company must at the same time furnish such shareholder with a complete list of all the other shareholders in the company. This would be an extraordinary undertaking for the Pennsylvania Railroad, with its over 100,000 shareholders, or the American Telegraph & Telephone Co., with its 680,000 shareholders, living in all 48 States and in 80 foreign countries. Every one of them would have had to receive from the corporation's headquarters three volumes, each as large as the Washington telephone directory, with every name and address of the shareholders printed in the volume. Is it strange that we have had opposition and criticism? This has been cured to a very considerable degree in the redraft of the bill.

My experience has been very pleasant in having these things pointed out and teaching me, and I think they have taught us a great deal more than we ever knew before about the business of the United States.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Not for a question but merely an expression of the hope that the gentleman, while he has the floor, will point out to what extent the bill now under consideration has eliminated these objectionable features so that we may know the merit of the bill as it is at present.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think I shall.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. A moment ago the gentleman spoke about section 11, which is the report section, and the gentleman stated he thought we had cured that. We have modified it, but I call the gentleman's attention to page 34, beginning with the word "except" in line 18, where we find these words:

> Except that this provision shall not be construed to prevent the Commission from imposing such additional requirements with respect to such reports, within the scope of this section and section 11.

Now, section 11 is the report section, so that while we have modified the bill, yet it does give the Federal Trade Commission the power to impose any additional requirements on reports that it may see fit to make.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RAYBURN. But it states that the Commission cannot go further than the requirements of section 11.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Section 11 is the report section.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; that is a limitation.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Then the bill says that the Commission has power to impose additional requirements with respect to such reports within the scope of this section and section 11.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman from Ohio is correct. While modifications were made in this so-called "report section", and I think rather important modifications, there still does reside in the Federal Trade Commission the power which the gentleman from Ohio has mentioned.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. Does not the gentleman still consider that very provision leaves the business interests affected laboring under great fear and doubt as to the possibilities of future regulations that may be imposed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will answer that question in this way. When I said the provision has been modified, the enumeration of the subjects to be covered in the reports required has been shortened. Some things that the committee believed were utterly unnecessary and put in merely for annoyance purposes have been eliminated. I regret myself that the sentence which the gentleman from Ohio has just read was put in the measure. It was put in after another modification had been made, which we thought was to be the final modification.

Mr. MAPES and Mr. PETTENGILL rose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield first to the gentleman from Michigan, my colleague on the committee.

Mr. MAPES. I think perhaps it would be interesting to state here the theory of the sentence to which the gentleman has referred. It is recognized, I think, that some of the States do not require utility corporations to make very complete reports, and one of the purposes of this legislation is to protect investors by requiring informative reports, and this provision was put in so as to make it clear that the Federal Trade Commission, if it thought enough information was not being given to afford investors an opportunity to pass intelligently upon the value of the securities, could call for additional information, not inconsistent with what the State law required.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. When the gentleman referred to the power of the Federal Trade Commission a moment ago, I thought the gentleman referred to it with regard to the accountancy section.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was talking about the accountancy section; yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. And was referring to the terrific expense that might be involved if new and different systems of accountancy were required and was not referring specifically to the section with regard to mere reports.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The language to which attention has been called is part of what might be called the accountancy paragraph.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If the gentleman will permit, I cannot agree with my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. The bill does not say anything about this last provision applying to States that require no system of accounting. The language is, "shall not be construed to prevent the Commission from imposing such additional requirements with respect to such reports", as they may need. It may be that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] is right, but I do not read it in that way. It seems to me to give the Commission broad powers to establish any additional requirements they want with respect to section 11, which is the report section.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The inaccuracy of my analysis of this particular section is due to something I must confess. I think I am not violating the rules of the committee. I offered an amendment myself inserting, on page 34, line 15, the words "or any State", so as to relieve corporations which are required by State laws to keep their accounts in a certain way from being required by the Federal Trade Commission to keep them in another way. At the next meeting of the committee I was absent and the sentence to which the gentleman from Ohio has called attention was inserted, although the amendment which I had proposed in the first instance was accepted.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RAYBURN. We were discussing that day accepting the additional language, and I remember we agreed to put in the words as to the States qualifying the language.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Undoubtedly the gentleman's recollection is accurate, but unfortunately I was absent that day from the committee. I simply mentioned that to explain my ignorance of the sentence read by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MAPES. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. I did not mean to state, if I did so state, that any State did not require some sort of a report to be made by utility corporations. All I said was that some did not require very complete or enlightening reports, and this sentence to which the gentleman has been referring simply invests the Federal Trade Commission, if it sees fit, with the power to call for additional information.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have been asked to find out where the modifications are which make the bill a better measure than the original one.

We will start with the marginal requirements. Under the original bill it was 60 percent. Most people thought that would bring a deflation and place the country in a worse condition than it is today. That has been reduced to 45 percent. Or he can borrow 100 percent of its lowest market price during the preceding 36 calendar months, but in no case more than 75 percent of the current market price. If I had my way, I would make the first alternative 40 percent instead of 45 percent.

Now, we are dealing with a very delicate thing when we deal with margins. We cannot tell here in the House of Representatives what is going to happen in the next 3 months or the next 6 months or the next year with respect to the demand for securities, the demand of the public for securities for investment as well as speculation.

I should have preferred that the whole provision be left absolutely flexible with the Federal Reserve Board to keep its hand on the situation. But the committee finally decided to write their formula into the statute. The Senate bill does not contain the formula, but leaves it to the Federal Reserve Board.

As I am informed—I may not be correct about it—that is substantially the way that it is done in London. Instead of the Federal Reserve Board, the control is by the Bank of England.

It is further modified by the fact that the bill gives the Federal Reserve Board the right to change the formula if it deems it wise so to do for the benefit of trade and commerce and so forth.

I suppose there will always remain in the minds of the Federal Reserve Board the fact that the Congress has written the formula, and it will take quite a situation to persuade the Board to abandon the formula and substitute its own regulation. It would be a matter of courage. Generally those decisions have to be made, if made at all, under very stressful conditions; but if we are to trust government at all, I should think we could trust the Federal Reserve Board to rise to the occasion with respect to changing margin conditions.

Instead of separating broker-dealer concerns and forcing segregation and putting any number of them out of business, this bill permits broker-dealers to continue in business under regulations fixed by the Federal Trade Commission, and implies that a study shall be made of that to see what the developments may be and whether further legislation is necessary.

State bonds and municipal bonds are now definitely placed in the exempt clause by this bill.

As I said, the proxy provision has been toned down, and although I regard the section as absolutely unnecessary, having nothing to do with the regulation of stock exchanges, I suppose it can be said that it is not going to impose much hardship or annoyance on anybody.

I hesitate to bring up a constitutional question. This bill, I assume, is founded upon the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. There is a long argument in the first two pages of the bill. In fact section 2 is a speech, and I would advise you all to read it. I have never seen anything quite like it proposed in legislation. It starts by stating that certain things are important and certain things are evil, and then goes on to say that the important things should be handled and the evil things should be prevented, and it ends up with an exhortation that the whole thing is the right thing to do and is well within the provisions of the Constitution, or words to that effect. That, of course, is designed to control the Supreme Court. If I had my way, as a matter of bill drafting, I would strike it out. It has no place in a statute of the United States. You do not put your arguments in statutes; you put your arguments in the reports of the committee or you make them on the floor of the House or the Senate.

May I now call the attention of Members to one matter which has been one of deep concern to me, although, perhaps, not so to many others. This bill imposes a marginal requirement not only upon brokers and dealers but also upon all bankers. That establishes in my view a new thought and a new principle in the treatment of bankers and banks under a statute of the United States. Under this bill a banker may not loan to one of his customers more than 55 percent of the market value of the stock which that customer is purchasing and wants to carry with the aid of the loan.

We are speaking now, of course, of listed securities. The same provision, of course, applies to the broker. He may not lend more than 55 percent. I can very well understand how a statute controlling the broker in this regard is defensible, and I make no complaint against it, but I have my doubts as to the soundness of having these margin provisions apply to all the banks. A broker, when he makes a loan to a customer, makes little or no inquiry as to the customer's financial standing, otherwise than connected with the collateral he puts up. Of course, in most instances he does not see the customer, as the orders come in by telegraph very often. He makes no inquiry as to the customer's character or standing in the community, or as to his other assets. He does not inform himself as to the nature of the customer's business. Those things do not interest the broker. All he must do is to comply with the rules of the exchange or the statute of the United States, as the case may be, with respect to the customer's margin; but when the customer of a bank goes to that bank, known to the president of the bank, to the directors of the bank, as a man of substance and standing in the community, and proposes that the bank make him a loan with which he may purchase a listed security and carry it with the aid of the loan, and the banker knows with whom he is talking and knows about the man's other assets and about his character and all about his business, how long he has been living in the town, all about his family, as he will, if he is anything like a wise banker, then the banker may be doing a perfectly sound thing, a perfectly safe thing, a thing which will aid in a small way the business transactions of the town, if he should loan to that man on a smaller margin than 45 percent. Yet this law is to step in between the individual customer and his own banker, whether that banker be in Oshkosh or Wichita, or some place in Montana, or in Texas, or in New York City.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. In the case the gentleman describes, if the man is a man of such standing as he describes, the banker could make a loan without this collateral security, or he could also make a loan to that extent, 45 percent, and then make a separate loan for an amount that he believes this man is entitled to receive. Is not that true? So that there is no danger of that provision at all.

Mrs. KAHN. That would be a direct evasion of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, of course the question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], if answered in the affirmative—and I do not know that I am competent to answer it either in the affirmative or in the negative—but if answered in the affirmative, and that answer were taken as true, means that this section is not worth anything. If it is to be evaded that easily, why have it at all with respect to banks?

I may be somewhat old fashioned in my regard for the function of a banker. I do not like to see him put in the same category as the broker. I think the banker is expected to use judgment, and the broker is not expected to use judgment to anything like the same extent in making loans.

I know my suggestion will not be and cannot be carried out; that is, to take the banks entirely out of this margin provision. That was discussed in committee, and it was decided otherwise. I dread it somewhat. I believe it will cramp the style, if I may use that phrase, of prospective investors away back in the hinterland, who want to go to their county banks and make loans, who cannot put up any such amount of collateral, or it would cause great hardship upon them if compelled to do so, as is imposed by this statute. I would rather trust the judgment of the banker who is well acquainted with his customer than I would the law.

Mr. DARDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. DARDEN. Does this limitation apply as between banks?

For instance, in my section there is a large number of small banks which operate seasonally and borrow from central banks, and at that time they hypothecate security. Would it apply to those banks?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It applies to all banks and to all persons and all corporations, all partnerships, all associations, and joint-stock companies, between themselves, or as an original transaction.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MILLIGAN. That only applies when they desire to buy securities?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is right. It is only for loans made to carry a security on an exchange, but, of course, that in itself is a tremendous field.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RICH. If a banker made a loan, as suggested by the gentleman a few moments ago, to an individual who was not only entitled to a loan of 45 percent but to a greater loan, if the intent of this law is such that the banker is supposed to have a 45-percent margin, and he loans a greater amount than that, the banker would be liable for neglect of duty if he did not require 45-percent margin against the loan?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, of course, the banker violates the law if he fails to require the 45-percent margin.

Mr. RICH. And the bank would be guilty of an offense?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. In case the purchase of stock is entirely financed by a banker, in case it goes sour, who gets the sour end, the banker or the broker?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The man who makes the loan is the man who violates the law, as I understand it.

Mr. BLACK. But they are both within the law. It can be financed 100 percent, within the law, by borrowings.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not under this bill.

Mr. BLACK. Not under this bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not under this bill.

Mr. COLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. COLE. Is there very much difference in the provision we are discussing, section 6 of the present bill, and the power which the Federal Reserve Board already has under the Glass-Steagall bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, the object of including banks is to prevent the use of bank credit in support of wild speculation. As it is described, the "sucking in", through channels of the banks, of the available credit reserves of the country, in support of speculation on the exchanges. The evil, which I suppose existed to a greater or lesser degree, but I do not know how great, was in the mind of the men of this House and of the Senate when the Glass-Steagall bill was passed at the extra session. There was inserted in the Glass-Steagall bill a provision to this effect—I am paraphrasing it, of course—that if the Federal Reserve Board or a Federal Reserve bank in a district made up its mind that one of the banks in that district was loaning too much money on the stock market, it could say to that bank in effect, "Taper down; taper down. Call some of those loans. Stop that. If you do not, if you persist, we will deny you the rediscount privilege at the Federal Reserve bank."

Now, that provision was designed to prevent the very evil which this inclusion of banks in the margin provision of this bill is designed to prevent. My contention is that the Glass-Steagall bill accomplishes the purpose. The Glass-Steagall bill will control, as to its volume, the amount of bank loans used for speculative purposes on the exchange. Volume will be controlled, but in this bill we go between the individual borrower and the banker, which I think is unnecessary.

Mr. COLE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. COLE. I agree with the gentleman that the Glass-Steagall bill, exercised by the Federal Reserve bank, would accomplish the same purpose. Of course, the gentleman knows the Glass-Steagall Act does not cover nonmember banks.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true; but I think they are finally going to come under the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. COLE. If the gentleman is satisfied with the provisions of the Glass-Steagall bill, the opinion of Governor Black, of the Federal Reserve bank, should have a great weight with him; he approves the provisions of section 6.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know he does. It takes some recklessness on my part to disagree with him.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. If the provisions of the Glass-Steagall Act applicable to member banks is good legislation with regard to member banks, why should not this legislation prove to be good with regard to the operations of nonmember banks?

Mr. WADSWORTH. This legislation is different in this respect, it steps in between the individual customer and his banker.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes; I appreciate that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the Glass-Steagall bill there is nothing of the sort. That bill steps between the bank and the speculative market and says to the bank: "Your volume of loans is too great; cut it down." It does not say to the banker, however, that he must cut John Smith's loan down or Bill Jones' loan; it simply says that he has too much money loaned and that he must cut it down. I think the provisions of that act will accomplish the purpose Congress had in mind then and the purpose it has in mind now.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RICH. The Glass-Steagall bill prohibits the association of broker and dealer in the banking business. A few moments ago the gentleman said that this bill would permit them to resume their old operations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The brokers and dealers?

Mr. RICH. The Glass-Steagall bill prohibited that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the Glass-Steagall bill did not touch that subject at all.

Mr. RICH. I do not know whether I understood the full meaning of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; I misspoke myself, if I said anything like that.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman draw a distinction as to the character of collateral?

Mr. WADSWORTH.. I do.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. There are common stock, preferred stock, and bonds. Should there not be a different margin requirement according to the nature of the security?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think there should be, and that is why I believe in complete flexibility. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to discuss the details of the bill, but shall make just a few observations on the broader aspects of it.

No more controversial measure has been before this House than H.R. 9323, known as the "securities exchange bill of 1934."

The bill as first written brought down an avalanche of criticism and objections. It is my conviction that the bill as first drawn was too drastic. Therefore, much of the criticism of that first draft has proved to be justified.

But extended public hearings have been held. Every objection has been given careful consideration. Revision after revision has been made with the purpose of eliminating the provisions that seemed to be too drastic.

Now, I think, we have a bill that will protect the public by preventing inequitable and unfair practices and that will in the end prove beneficial to legitimate operators on our stock exchanges.

This bill does three things. It protects investors, controls market manipulations that are destructive to values, and tends to curb destructive speculation.

This measure strikes directly at what I believe is the most vicious practice of the stock exchanges—that is, the making of what is known as "wash sales" and "matched orders." This kind of manipulation is on a par with the use of loaded dice or other devices utilized by crooked professional gamblers in the conduct of their profession. It is, however, more reprehensible. No sane man enters a gambling house expecting to get a fair break for his money. But hundreds of thousands of good, honest American citizens pay their money to brokers, thinking that they are dealing with conservative, responsible, business men who are affording them the facilities of the market on an even chance with all others who use the market for the purpose of buying and selling securities. These people think they are investing their money in legitimate securities. That should be the case. If this measure is enacted into law, I believe that will be the case henceforth.

I hold no brief for those who would deliberately interfere with or hamper legitimate business. On the other hand, I insist that since the stock market has in the past been guilty of practices that transcend the legitimate, they, as well as all other offenders, should be brought within the law that calls for an honest, fair, and open chance for the citizen who desires to invest his money in legitimate securities. If in so doing he loses through the natural or ordinary hazard in industry and commerce, that is a loss he is willing to take. But if he is sheared like a lamb through a rigged market, through manipulations resulting from wash sales and matched orders, he has a legitimate cause for complaint, and it is his Government's business, through its legislative and executive branches, to throw about this stock-purchasing and stock-selling business such safeguards as will make these tricky devices, so long indulged in, impossible in the future.

This is a measure that President Roosevelt strongly recommends. In the face of the terrific drive against the measure, the President has repeated his recommendations. He is acting in the interest of honest business and honest investors. His motives are the highest. Shall we listen to the uninformed protestors or to the special interests who are objecting to this bill? Or shall we follow the leadership of the best friend the people of the United States ever had? Let us have the courage to pass this bill, knowing that it is an honest bill, framed for the benefit of honest people. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I take this minute merely for the purpose of answering the gentleman from California.

We have plenty of laws in New York against wash sales and matched orders; and we have the provisions of the United States mail fraud law against the same thing. We do not need this bill to give that particular protection. I do not think the gentleman will find anyone who has lost money recently on the New York Stock Exchange because of wash sales or matched orders.

Mr. FORD. Not recently; but how about the past?

Mr. BLACK. That may have been the case years and years ago.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as there are no further requests for time this afternoon from Members on either side, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 9323) to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

GILBERT DU MOTIER, MARQUIS DE LA FAYETTE

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a report to accompany House Concurrent Resolution No. 37, providing for a joint session of the two Houses of Congress for appropriate exercises in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the death of Gilbert du Motier, Marquis de La Fayette (Rept. No. 1412), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF FORMULATION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a report to accompany House Joint Resolution 265, providing for the preparation and completion of plans for a comprehensive observance of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the formulation of the Constitution of the United States (Rept. No. 1413), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

A CENTURY OF PROGRESS

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to insert in the RECORD a letter from the President of the United States to the Congress under date of March 27, 1934, in relation to the Century of Progress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from the President of the United States to the Congress under date of March 27, 1934, in relation to the Century of Progress:

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enclosed report from the Chicago World's Fair Centennial Commission to the end that legislation may be enacted extending the availability of funds previously appropriated for Government participation in A Century of Progress, the Chicago World's Fair Centennial Celebration, in 1933, to June 30, 1935, and also authorizing the appropriation of funds in the amount of $405,000 for the purpose of defraying the expenses of participation by the Government of the United States in the reopening of A Century of Progress, the Chicago World's Fair Centennial Celebration, in 1934.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 27, 1934.

PROF. ALBERT EINSTEIN

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered in Chicago April 8, 1934.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me at the National Conference of the Committee on Defense of Human Rights, held in Chicago, Ill., on Sunday, April 8, 1934:

Mr. Chairman and delegates, the privilege accorded me of attending your conference is profoundly appreciated, and it is with a keen feeling of pleasure that I have come to join you, but equally keen is my sense of regret that it is necessary for liberty-loving Americans in this twentieth century to gather in assembly in aid of the protection of minorities and the defense of human rights. Fortunately, we, in America, now enjoy, as in the beginning, the happiness, freedom, and liberty guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. The United States of America still is, and may it ever be, known in the world as a "haven of liberty and true civilization."

In the present Congress there is pending the measure which has become entitled "House Joint Resolution 309": A resolution to admit Dr. Albert Einstein to American citizenship. The measure which I was privileged to introduce in the House of Representatives in Washington is intended to confer upon the "most eminent of the eminent" the greatest honor in the gift of the country—her citizenship.

Reads the simple document:

"Whereas Prof. Albert Einstein has been accepted by the scientific world as a savant and genius; and

"Whereas his activities as a humanitarian have placed him high in the regard of countless of his fellowmen; and

"Whereas he has publicly declared on many occasions to be a lover of the United States and an admirer of its Constitution; and

"Whereas the United States is known in the world as a "haven of liberty and true civilization": Therefore be it

"Resolved, By the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Albert Einstein is hereby unconditionally admitted to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States."

As a United States Representative from New Jersey, I have felt that in honoring such a great man as Professor Einstein, the American people would be doing no more or less than honoring themselves. We like his greatness. We admire his genius. We cherish his humility. He came to us by choice; we choose to have him always if we can. He is imbued with the American principles of liberty; he has all the attributes of a true American; he has brought prestige and fame to America.

The United States has previously bestowed honors upon him. Our country, along with many others, has competed for his genius. He has finally come to us, to our land of liberty, has "this most illustrious scientist since Isaac Newton, one of the most appealing personalities of the world." He will be with us the greater part of the time, although he will leave us temporarily each year to impart his learning at institutions in other countries. He is of the world. But who shall gainsay that he does not now rightfully belong to America?

"My political idea is democracy", he has said. And further, "I believe that you in the United States have hit upon the right idea. You choose a President for a reasonable length of time and give him enough power to acquit himself properly of his responsibilities."

In the many expressions of this great mathematician and genius there is food for thought. Once knowing his simple, honest, sympathetic manner as gleaned from his life and work, nothing that he has said or done can fairly be misconstrued.

I have read his comment on the horrors of war and the virtues of peace. It brought echoes of what Sherman said of war. It revived in memory the ejaculations of many World War veterans, friends of mine, who, after the armistice, said, "No more war", thinking aloud, but yet ready to resume hostilities at the sound of the country's bugle. I have listened to the words of Theodore of Roosevelt fame, "We must have peace", and then more emphatically, "We must have peace; but if we must have war to gain peace, then we must war for the sake of peace." Devoutly committed to the cause of international peace, I have heard the genius Einstein denounce war—as most have at one time or another—and still I have seen the great humanitarian hasten to the defense of the people of his race militantly when they were in jeopardy, and I have marked his devotion to the cause of liberty—"liberty without which," he said, "life to a self-respecting man is not worth living."

In a great speech in Albert Hall, London, England, October 4, 1933, Dr. Einstein spoke of the blessings of freedom, saying: "We are concerned not merely with the technical problem of securing and maintaining peace but also with the important tasks of education and enlightenment. If we want to resist the powers which threaten to suppress intellectual and individual freedom, we must keep clearly before us what is at stake and what we owe to that freedom which our ancestors won for us after hard struggles.

"Without such freedom there would have been no Shakespeare, no Goethe, Newton, Faraday, Pasteur, or Lister. There would be no comfortable houses for the mass of the people, no railways or wireless, no protection against epidemics, no cheap books, no culture, no enjoyment of art for all. There would be no machines to relieve people from the arduous labor needed for the production of the essential necessities of life. Most people would lead a dull life of slavery just as under the ancient despotisms of Asia. It is only men who are free who create the inventions and intellectual works which to us moderns make life worthwhile."

As becomes a scientist, he has discoursed on the scientific and has turned from science to religion—to the supernatural. I have pictured him as he reflected upon the great mystery, with what seemed to me a searching mind, yet fervid heart. My study of his writings brought me back to the saintly Newman to recall his perplexities, which emerged triumphant in Lead Kindly Light. I saw Einstein perplexed, but religious, though tolerant. I peeked, I thought, into the inner recesses of his heart and his mind; and I saw there, as I believe, one of the Godliest of men.

An adherent to the principles of social justice, he has expressed himself vigorously on behalf of the masses—as have many of our leading statesmen—and in that characteristic we find, and find only, the great humanitarian.

He is living immortal in our midst.

Professor Einstein has accepted a life appointment at the Institute for Advanced Study. It was established by the generosity of two lovable philanthropists of my State of New Jersey—Mrs. Felix Fuld and her brother, Mr. Louis Bamberger, of Newark. It has, as you may know, temporary quarters in Fine Hall, Graduate Mathematical Building, at Princeton University. Dr. and Mrs. Einstein are residing now in Princeton, where they are the recipients of the love and affection of the people of my State. The State of New Jersey feels honored by their presence. The institute is honored. Its acquisition of his genius recalls what the great Poincaré wrote of the savant early in his career:

"Herr Einstein is one of the most original minds I have ever met. In spite of his youth he already occupies a very honorable position among the foremost savants of his time. What we marvel at in him, above all, is the ease with which he adjusts himself to new conceptions and draws all possible deductions from them. He does not cling tightly to classical principles but sees all conceivable possibilities when he is confronted with a physical problem. In his mind this becomes transformed into an anticipation of new phenomena that may some day be verified in actual experience. * * * The future will give more and more proofs of the merits of Herr Einstein, and the university that succeeds in attaching him to itself may be certain that it will derive honor from its connection with the young master."

As proof of the esteem for Professor and Mrs. Einstein of the people of my State, including the director and faculty of the institute and the president and faculty of the university housing it, one of the largest and most enthusiastic receptions of welcome ever known to New Jersey was recently tendered to him and his gentle, charming wife and companion. We love them both.

My own admiration for the great scientist, mathematician, and physicist, has existed for some time. My shortcomings in mathematics may account for it in part. I marveled at his mastery of problems that were never quite clear to me in their simpler forms. I saw him conquer not only those things beyond my comprehension but beheld him penetrate also far beyond the realms achieved by any scientist. His name is synonymous with relativity. I endeavored to follow the path he blazed in science but finally contented myself with the admiration his genius created and the joy of appreciation of his kind, simple nature and his humane liberty-loving character.

In his simplicity and modesty, he has written: "Everyone should be respected as an individual, but no one idolized. It is an irony of fate that I should have been showered with so much uncalled-for and unmerited admiration and esteem. Perhaps this adulation springs from the unfulfilled wish of the multitude to comprehend the few ideas which I, with my weak powers, have advanced."

Such as he, scientist, philosopher, humanitarian merits the high regard of any nation. Great Britain, France, Spain, and other countries have welcomed him and offered him their citizenship. Certainly the United States, which he has publicly declared to and does love—beacon of liberty that it is—gladly will extend to Dr. Einstein all the privileges and prerogatives of her citizenship.

I know that he loves the land of his birth, the German people and his Jewish race. In that he is like all true Americans, including Americans of foreign extraction, and the affection that he bears for his native soil does not lessen, but rather accentuates, the love that he has for this liberty-loving land of ours.

He is saddened, as are we, by the plight of the Jews in Germany; his Jewish traditions were inculcated in him at his mother's knee; his people are bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh, and he is proud of his race. As a result he is beloved and idolized by the Jewish people. But they are not alone. We all join with them in our admiration, love, and esteem for the great man amongst us. His coming to us has been a tribute to true civilization; so is it a telling rebuke to man's inhumanity to man.

Here minorities are protected and human rights safeguarded. Our Constitution, which Dr. Einstein so admires, by its provisions grants inalienable rights to minorities which may not be taken away. As long as it remains our basic law, which may God preserve to us, minorities along with the majorities shall enjoy the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness free from persecution and oppression. We are met in the United States, having come from all nations, to carry on and have our being according to the dictates of the individual, with conscience free from the restraint of oppression—political, religious, or otherwise. We believe that ours is the greatest nation on earth. The United States is, and ever will be, a true guardian of civilization. That protection we offer gladly to Dr. Einstein, thinker and doer, humanitarian and friend, permanently.

By so doing, we shall confer an unprecedented honor, not only upon the great scientist, but we shall pay tribute to the noble, God-respecting, law-abiding attributes of the Jewish people which he exemplifies.

Prompted by the genius of a great man, humanitarian, lover of the United States, and admirer of its Constitution—and inspired I might say—knowing as I did the sentiment of the citizens of New Jersey, which is symbolic of the feeling of the people of the United States, I, as a United States Representative from New Jersey offered in Congress the resolution with which you are now familiar for the purpose of admitting Dr. Einstein unconditionally to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States.

Now, I know of no more worthy purpose than that which prompts this committee to confer here today. You have come from every section of the country in an effort to alleviate human suffering, to protect persecuted minorities, and defend human rights. I congratulate you upon the noble work you have undertaken. Human rights transcend all others. Your fight is not for the Jewish people, but for all humanity, for every liberty-loving man and woman of whatever race or creed. By your power and influence may you quickly succeed in putting an end to oppression and persecution wherever they may exist.

It is a distinguished honor to meet with you here and to be permitted to pay tribute to Dr. Einstein whom you and I with you love, and to help promote the triumph of true civilization so dear to his heart—and to ours—over the relic of the Dark Ages—sinister oppression. I sincerely thank you for this honor and privilege and heartily do I enlist in the cause you have undertaken in the name of humanity.

THE FRAZIER-LEMKE BILL

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, last Wednesday evening, April 25, it was my privilege to preside over a meeting of representatives of farming, business, banking, and the professions, of the States of Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois. The meeting, as I announced to the House on the same day, was held in the Caucus Room of the old House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

The delegates and representatives who attended this meeting came here solely in the interests of the Frazier-Lemke bill for the following reasons:

First. For an adequate volume of money to meet the normal money needs of the Nation.

Second. The bill completely destroys bankers' control and places it back where it lawfully belongs—with the Federal Government.

Third. It definitely stabilizes the value of farm land, improvements thereon, and adequately provides a method for the complete rehabilitation of all farmers and home owners who are being ruined by the millions under prevailing conditions.

Fourth. It provides for a legitimate and proper method of financing the money needs of the Federal Government.

Fifth. In fact, the application of this Frazier-Lemke principle of monetary reform will quickly prove that the American people will not need regimentating methods or some of the ridiculous palliatives that are now being employed.

Sixth. In stabilizing the value of property, it will revive the love for farms and homes among our American people on a scale never equaled heretofore and usher in an era of economic freedom, from which will naturally flow economic justice, and definitely establish the Jeffersonian principle of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none" and once more give the American people the measure of freedom to exercise their God-given talents relieved of the fear of ruination, misery, and want they are now so sorely afflicted with.

Resolutions embodying the text of the foregoing were adopted unanimously. In opening the meeting I made the following statement:

I would say to our distinguished Senators and Representatives from several States, and to these farmers from the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, and the representatives of the National Farmers' Union that this meeting tonight, in my humble opinion, is one that will largely determine the future course of American agriculture. I think it will determine or prove the soundness of what our good President said—I think it was yesterday—when he said that "the new deal is evolution rather than revolution."

Having been in this farm fight for the past 15 years, I believe in all candor and frankness that the farmers of the Corn Belt of this country, the farmers of the semiarid regions of the Northwest and the Southwest have reached that momentous epoch in their lives when the next year will determine whether or not they will go along with this country as they have in the past, as peaceful, law-abiding, wealth-creating, tax-paying citizens, by peaceful evolution, or whether they will find it necessary to accomplish their ends by riotous revolution.

I want to say to you men from Illinois and Indiana that 15 years ago I visited practically every big farmer in your States and sold them purebred hogs. I bought hogs of your purebred livestock growers, and now, after 15 years, we say that American agriculture today is at the lowest ebb in all of its history, reports to the contrary notwithstanding.

The word that we have received from Congress year after year has been if the farmers of this country will only unite on a common program, Congress will enact into law their program; and I say to you without fear of successful contradiction that the farmers of this country, with the possible exception of the cotton-growing South, have united on a common program, and that program is the passage of the Frazier-Lemke bill.

Now I am going to be brief. It is a great honor to preside over this meeting. Distinguished Senators and Congressmen, our only and our sole objective at the present moment is to secure enough additional signatures on the Frazier-Lemke petition to bring our bill to a vote on the floor of the House of Representatives. We are willing to abide by the consequences. We are willing to abide by the decision of the House of Representatives, and all we ask is fair treatment, to give our bill a chance to be voted on.

The officers of the National Farmers Union, Mr. E. H. Everson, of St. Charles, S.Dak., president; Mr. Edward B. Kennedy, of Kankakee, Ill., secretary; and Mrs. M. C. Puncke, of Kankakee, Ill., assistant secretary, were present and addressed the meeting.

Senator PATRICK MCCARRAN addressed the delegates and pledged his unqualified support to the Frazier bill in the Senate. A number of Members of this House were present and were called upon for expressions of opinion, practically all of whom expressed approval of the bill. Some of these Members had signed the petition, some indicated that they would sign it. Most interesting of all, however, were the remarks of the actual farmers who were present and who expressed themselves most forcibly in support of the bill.

The concensus of opinion was that instead of doing something for agriculture, something had been done to agriculture, that instead of restoring the purchasing- and debt-paying power of the farmer, it had taken it away from him following the war. Coupon grabbers have been permitted to escape paying their part of the war, and the amount that they should have paid has been taken out of the agricultural wealth produced in this country. The National Farmers' Union unequivocally and vigorously supports the Frazier-Lemke bill. This bill has more support for it in Congress than any other agricultural bill pending. The legislatures of 26 States have endorsed it.

These men say the farmer wants a new deal, a real new deal—not just a bunch of "new dealers" who stack the cards and give the other fellow all the aces. These men refer to Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, and former Assistant Secretary, but now Under Secretary, Tugwell, as the dealers who stacked the cards against them. All the farmer wants is the opportunity to retain the title to his home.

These representatives of the farmers from the Corn Belt say that neither the Farm Credit Administrator nor the Agricultural Adjustment Administration will make it possible for farmers to retain the titles to their homes. The first thing is to make it possible for the farmer to be secure in his home, for the farmer's home is the dearest thing this side of Heaven to him. The farmer sets aside a little money for a rainy day and now finds it in a closed bank. We are supporting legislation that will release these deposits in closed banks, but it appears that we are not to have the chance of voting on this legislation even though we obtained 145 signatures to discharge the committee from further consideration of the bill.

The farmer fights the elements. Now he must fight other elements that seek to deprive him of what little he has left.

One prominent official of the National Farmers' Union expressed the opinion that no Congressman or Senator should go home without giving the bill a chance to come out on the floor of the House and give it a free and fair chance to pass, for it will rescue the farm homes of America, and will be the salvation of this Nation, and a start in the right direction.

Someone asked the question, "How can Members of Congress who have farm constituents go back home after adjournment and answer the farmer who has lost or is losing his farm by the confiscation route of the money lender?" The answer was "that unless the bill passes, the farmers will answer next November. The time has come when the farmer will not be denied what he wants when longer he wants it."

The Frazier bill has been in the Senate for 2 years. It has had extensive hearings. People understand it, although they pretend to misunderstand it and disseminate false information and propaganda concerning its merits.

Mrs. Puncke, assistant secretary, National Farmers Union, a woman who is a farmer herself, who calls on farmers, who talks to the head of the family, and who understands the problem of the better half of the family, informed the assembly that every day in her work she sees many sad foreclosures and confiscations of farm property. She sees men and women down and out. She says that the Farm Credit Administration has saved some homes and postponed the day of reckoning, but it is not really saving our farmers or our homes. The farmers cannot pay the interest and the charges connected with the Farm Credit Act, and eventually the day of reckoning will come again.

She made it apparent that people who live here in Washington lose touch with conditions at home. They get away from the feeling of the thing—the terrible distress that is in the air, and she stoutly maintained that the Frazier bill is the one bill through which we do not have to pay tribute to the international bankers. It puts money in circulation so that farm prices will rise. It gives us money on which we pay a service charge to our National Government. The farmers are at the end of their rope. They have no equity on which to borrow more. The Government promised to see them through and to give them a chance to live. The Frazier-Lemke bill is the only bill that is going to save our independent farm homes.

The situation in the country is dangerous. There is a growing resentment against the deal which the farmers are getting that is some day going to flare up; and when it does, God help this country. We must have the Frazier bill, and we are going to get it.

Senator MCCARRAN showed his perfect understanding of this farm butchery when he stated that while money is being poured by the billions into certain lines, we failed to give it to the lower strata of life where labor and toil live hourly. We fail to go into the ranks of the humble. That is what you are fighting for in this measure which you have before you, a measure that will pour money down to the grass roots, on the beginning of all life, whence it will work its way upward to the upper stratas and benefit them to the same degree that it benefits tillers of the soil.

The National Farmers Union is one of the most unselfish, loyal, and aggressive organizations in the country. These farmers have organized themselves. There is not a paid organizer in any State. This is one of the features that stands out above all else. Some Members of this House say that the petition should not be signed. The rule to discharge the committee from further consideration of a bill is just as much a creature of the House of Representatives as the committee to which the bill has been referred.

It has been contended by some that the liberal provisions of this bill would enable the owner of marginal land to sell it to the Government through the mortgage route. This is impossible, since the bill does not provide for the making of any new loans.

Still others have said that $3,000,000,000 will not be sufficient to pay off the total farm mortgage indebtedness. But the bill provides that the available surplus and net profit of the Federal Reserve banks shall be invested in 1½-percent mortgage bonds. This, together with the amortization payments of 1½ percent, could be used to purchase additional mortgage bonds. This would make available the necessary funds to refinance the existing mortgage debt as fast as it is possible to refinance and appraise and complete the loans.

And some ask, If we start doing this, where will we stop? It is not a question of where we will stop, but we have to start here. We must restore the income and purchasing power of the American farmer so that the laborer can be put into productive labor to serve the farmer. He can use $25,000,000,000 worth of the products of labor, such as harness, fences, paint, repairs, cloth, machinery, and the things that labor must produce in order to have a job.

Some members of the House who have signed the petition admitted that they had refused to sign until they were convinced that the bill was sound. There are those who are not in full accord with the bill, but they believe that something must be done for the farmers, and done now. They believe that the terrific situation which confronts the farmers in meeting their debts justifies the support of this bill, even though you are not in complete accord with all its provisions. The existing situation is much worse than anything which might be produced by the operation of the Frazier bill. Agriculture is on the rocks now. How much longer it can go on is the vital question. The farmer cannot pay the current high rate of interest and take the low level of prices for what he sells. We had best give the Frazier bill an opportunity to save the farmer rather than to bring about a chaotic condition by our present somewhat modified policy of laissez-faire.

One of the most pathetic and tragic stories ever heard came from the lips of Mr. F. J. Hendrichs, of Bowling Green, Ohio, a dirt farmer on one of the best 225-acre farms in our State, raising abundant crops of corn each year, raising hogs, feeding each winter 50 steers. Years ago, when he first acquired his farm, there were no good farms. In the wintertime the mud was belly-deep on the horses with which he had to travel to get to the county seat. The land was swampy, needed ditching and clearing. Now the land is tilled and drained in the most perfect manner possible. It is bounded by hard-surfaced modern roads, paid for by assessing the property owners, one of the worst injustices ever perpetrated upon the farmer.

Mr. Hendrichs 2 years ago bought his feeder cattle from Texas. He bought the best that was on the market. He would order cattle from some of the local dealers, make a nominal payment down when the order was filled, and would send a draft in advance when they were ready to ship. He was astounded to find that on one load of cattle that he bought, when he received the bill for it, he was to forward a draft to a banker in Wall Street, which indicates conclusively that the Wall Street pirates are covering the country pretty thoroughly when they are in the cattle business in the Southwest.

This gentleman has owned his farm all his life. It is one of the finest in the State. He could have sold it before the war for $150 an acre. Many times during the war period he could have sold it for much more, but he did not sell. He and his good wife had lived on it and worked the soil all their life. Their children had grown up. They didn't want the farm sold.

Following the war Mr. Hendrichs, as was the plight of practically all farmers, lost money each year through declining prices of his own products and because of the high cost of commodities he had to buy and high taxes. Much sickness came into the little family. His son had to go to the hospital. A little later Mr. Hendricks, Sr., had to go to the hospital. He brought tears to the eyes of some of his listeners when he said that before leaving for the hospital he journeyed outside his home and longingly gazed over his little domain, his buildings and equipment, because he thought that might be the last time he would ever see them. Then his hard of cattle became infected with fever, and he had to sell them for next to nothing. He is now $13,000 in the red, so he had to put a mortgage on his farm and home. His good wife was most reluctant, for somehow she seemed to feel the sorrow and suffering which that mortgage might cause some day.

Mortgage is indeed a sinister word, taken from the French words, " mort " meaning death, and " gage " meaning hand—literally the hand of death that strangles to an economic death 2,000 farmers and home owners every time the sun rises and sets. But there was nothing else to do, so they mortgaged their farm for $10,000. They are now about to be foreclosed. They cannot get the necessary amount through the Farm Credit Administration; and unless the Frazier-Lemke bill is passed, it means old-age pensions, charity, or doles for this real knight of nature's nobility, 78 years old today, and still strong physically and mentally.

When these splendid tillers of the soil, these pioneers who blazed the trail, who cleared the wilderness and made them grow the waving fields of golden grain, when these patriarchs, these once independent sovereigns, now come before us and point to a threadbare and faded suit of clothes which they admit was bought 10 years ago, and that they have no money now with which to buy a new one, it is high time that this Congress open its eyes, that the Congress look down upon the grass roots and in the windows of the homes of the finest citizens in our land.

The Frazier bill is the only remedy. If you do not help us now, you cannot help many of us at all later on. We have no such wild hopes as immediate prosperity or becoming rich following the passage of the Frazier bill. We merely want an opportunity to break the strangling cord of the money lenders. We want to hold our farms for ourselves and our children and our children's children. We do not care for any more of the unfair treatment, the unsympathetic attitude, the discrimination, and the complete damned foolishness of the Farm Credit Administration.

He also presented the petition of Local Union No. 19367, Federal Labor Union, of Hutchinson, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called "Wagner-Lewis bill", being the bill (S. 2616) to raise revenue by levying an excise tax upon employers, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Hutchinson, Salina, and Wichita, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called "Fletcher-Rayburn bill", providing for the regulation of stock exchanges, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH presented resolutions of Bricklayers, Masons, and Plasterers International Union, No. 11, of Massachusetts, of Fall River, and the National Woolsorters' Association of the United States, Lawrence, in the State of Massachusetts, favoring the passage of the so-called "Wagner-Lewis bill", being the bill (S. 2616) to raise revenue by levying an excise tax upon employers, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by members of the parishes of St. John, of Millers Falls, and St. Patrick, of

INTERNAL-REVENUE TAX ON LIQUOR

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I present a letter in the nature of a petition from the chairman of the Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
THE ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES CONTROL COMMISSION,
Statehouse, Boston, April 28, 1934.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: The Massachusetts Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission recommends that the internal-revenue tax of $2 a gallon on liquor be reduced to $1.

Very truly yours,
ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES CONTROL COMMISSION,
WM. P. HAYES, Chairman.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. WALSH. I also present and ask that there be printed in full in the RECORD, and appropriately referred, a resolution adopted by the City Council of Revere, Mass.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITY OF REVERE, MASS., April 28, 1934.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Senator, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: At a regular meeting of the city council held on Monday, April 16, 1934, the following resolution was declared ordered, accepted, and adopted:

"The Revere City Council, in regular meeting assembled this 16th day of April 1934, wishes to record itself as endorsing the bill filed in Congress by Congressman WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr., which would allow a contribution of one third of the assistance given by any State which provided old-age pensions to persons 65 years old or over.

"While Massachusetts has a required age minimum of 70 years at the present time, and no assured plan which will provide the source of revenue for this outlay for pensions, the passage of the congressional act will lift a great burden of at least one third from the shoulders of poll-tax payers who are now paying $1 each year for this purpose.

"The reduction of the age limit from 70 to 65 will not add any greater burden on the taxpayer, since any prospective applicant for a pension at 65 is presumably unemployable and therefore probably being pauperized through welfare relief. The transfer of many persons over 65 years of age from the welfare rolls to the pensions rolls will cost no more in dollars and cents, but will, on the other hand, restore confidence to discouraged citizens, and create greater faith in the future of many employees who have no outlook beyond their present welfare allotments.

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Congressman CONNERY and Senators WALSH and COOLIDGE."

Returned in 10 days without signature, April 28, 1934.

A. A. C., Mayor.

Attest:

ALBERT J. BROWN, City Clerk.

AMENDMENT OF COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION BILL

Mr. WALSH. I also present a telegram from George F. Booth, publisher of the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram and Gazette, protesting against the adoption of the so-called "Wagner-Hatfield amendment" to the Dill communications bill, which I ask may be treated in the nature of a petition, printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WORCESTER, MASS., April 30, 1934.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Wagner-Hatfield amendment, as we understand it, to the pending Dill Communications Commission bill seems to us very unfair and may be inimical to our radio station WTAG, in which we have invested a large sum of money, and which performs a distinct service to Worcester and central New England. If you are not already cognizant with the terms of this bill, will you give it some attention? It seems to me this bill is unfair to the radio industry as a whole.

GEORGE F. BOOTH,
Publisher Worcester Telegram and Gazette.

COINAGE OF 3-CENT PIECES

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, at the annual convention last week of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association in New York resolutions were adopted urging the coinage of a 3-cent coin. The resolutions pointed out that an intermediate coin is desirable between the 1-cent piece and the nickel. I quote one sentence from the resolutions of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association as follows:

> Millions of daily newspapers are now being sold for 3 cents, and a 3-cent coin would simplify the purchase of newspapers and be a convenience to the buying public.

It might also be remarked that we now have the 3-cent postage stamp.

I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to provide for the coinage of a 3-cent piece composed of copper and nickel, and I ask that the bill may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3500) authorizing the coinage of a 3-cent nickel piece, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3515 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3515. The minor coins of the United States shall be a 5-cent piece, a 3-cent piece, and a 1-cent piece. The alloy for the 5- and 3-cent pieces shall be of copper and nickel, to be composed of three fourths copper and one fourth nickel. The alloy of the 1-cent piece shall be 95 percent of copper and 5 percent of tin and zinc, in such proportions as shall be determined by the Director of the Mint. The weight of the piece of 5 cents shall be 77.16 grains troy; of the 3-cent piece, 30 grains; and of the 1-cent piece, 48 grains."

SEC. 2. Section 3517 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3517. Upon the coins there shall be the following devices and legends: Upon one side there shall be an impression emblematic of liberty, with an inscription of the word 'Liberty', and the year of the coinage, and upon the reverse shall be the figure or representation of an eagle, with the inscriptions 'United States of America' and 'E Pluribus Unum', and a designation of the value of the coin; but on the dime, 5-, 3-, and 1-cent piece the figure of the eagle shall be omitted."

SUPREME COURT DECISION IN ILLINOIS BELL TELEPHONE CASE

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Illinois Bell Telephone Co. case. The principles of law announced in this decision are so far-reaching that I think it should be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the decision of the Supreme Court was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

(Nos. 440 and 548. October term, 1933)

BENJAMIN F. LINDHEIMER AND OTHERS, CONSTITUTING THE ILLINOIS COMMERCE COMMISSION OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS; OTTO KERNER, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS; AND THE CITY OF CHICAGO, APPELLANTS, v. ILLINOIS BELL TELEPHONE CO. ILLINOIS BELL TELEPHONE CO., APPELLANT, v. BENJAMIN F. LINDHEIMER AND OTHERS, CONSTITUTING THE ILLINOIS COMMERCE COMMISSION OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS; OTTO KERNER, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS; AND THE CITY OF CHICAGO. APPEALS FROM THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS

Mr. Chief Justice Hughes delivered the opinion of the Court:

This case comes here for the second time. It presents the question of the validity under the fourteenth amendment of rates prescribed by the Illinois Commerce Commission for telephone service in the city of Chicago. The commission's order, made on August 16, 1923, to be effective October 1, 1923, reduced rates applicable to a large part of the intrastate service of the appellee, Illinois Bell Telephone Co.[1] In this suit, brought by that company in September 1923, an interlocutory injunction was granted upon the condition that if the injunction were dissolved the company should refund the amounts charged in excess of the challenged rates. We affirmed that order (269 U.S. 531). The final hearing was not had until April 1929—a delay found to be attributable to the city of Chicago. On that hearing the district court, composed of three judges, entered a final decree making the injunction permanent (38 F. (2d) 77). We reversed that decree and remanded the case for further proceedings (Smith v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co., 282 U.S. 133). Further evidence was then taken and the district court made new findings and entered a final decree which permanently restrained the enforcement of the commission's order and released the company from obligation to refund the moneys which had been collected pending the suit (3 F.Supp. 595). The State authorities and the city bring this direct appeal (Jud. Code, sec. 266). The company brings a cross appeal to review the findings below, insisting that its property has been undervalued and that substantial amounts of its operating expenses have been disallowed.

No. 440. The appeal of the State officers and the city of Chicago: On the former appeal it appeared that no distinction had been made by the commission or by the district court between the intrastate and the interstate property and business of the company. We found that separation was essential to the appropriate recognition of the competent governmental authority in each field of regulation. Accordingly we directed that as to the value of the property employed in the intrastate business in Chicago and as to the amounts of revenue and expenses incident to that business, separately considered, there should be specific findings. And as a rate order which is confiscatory when made may cease to be confiscatory, and one which is valid when made may become confiscatory at a later period, we held that there should be appropriate findings for each of the years since the date of the Commission's order (282 U.S., pp. 149, 162). On the further hearing that difficult task was so well performed that no question is now raised as to the allocation of property to the intrastate and interstate services, respectively, in the Chicago area, the allocation being made on the basis of use.[2] Nor is there dispute with respect to the separation of expenses. Appellants object to the separation of revenues, insisting that certain revenues were improperly assigned to the interstate instead of the intrastate business.[3]

Considering the fact that 99 percent of the stock of appellee is owned by the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., which also owns substantially the same proportion of the stock of the Western Electric Co., we directed that there should be further examination of the purchases made by appellee from the Western Electric Co. and of the payments made by appellee to the American Co. As it appeared that the Western Electric Co., through the organization and control of the American Co., was virtually the manufacturing department for the Bell system, we directed specific findings to be made as to the net earnings of the Western Electric Co. in that department, and as to the extent to which, if at all, such profit figured in the estimates upon which the charge of confiscation was predicated. We also held that there should be specific findings with regard to the cost to the American Co. of the services which it rendered to appellee and the reasonable amount which should be allocated in that respect to the operating expenses of appellee's intrastate business (id., pp. 153, 157).

The district court entered into an exhaustive examination of these questions and made detailed findings. The court found that the equipment and supplies furnished by the Western Electric Co. had been sold to appellee at fair and reasonable prices, and that the earnings of the Western Electric Co. on its investment allocated to the business done with appellee, and its profits on sales had been fair and reasonable, with the exception of an advance in prices of 10.2 percent effective on November 1, 1930. That advance the court disapproved, and in determining the reasonable outlays to be allowed to appellee after that date, the court made a reduction of 10 percent from the prices charged by the Western Electric Co.[4] Appellee contests this reduction and appellants object to the amounts allowed.

The district court made specific findings as to the character of the services rendered by the American Co. under its license contracts with appellee and the amounts of the cost of these services which should be allocated to the operating expenses of the latter's intrastate business. In the years 1923 to 1928, inclusive, when the court found that the payments under the license contracts charged on appellee's books exceeded the cost as thus determined and allocated, only the cost was held to be chargeable to operating expenses, but in the years 1929 to 1931, inclusive, when the license payments as so charged were less than the cost, only the amount of the license payments was allowed as an operating expense.[5] Appellants raise many questions in opposition to these determinations of costs and allocations, while appellee contends that the costs as found were less than the true costs and that the full amounts paid under the license contracts should have been allowed.

The evidence with respect to the value of appellee's property employed in its intrastate business at Chicago is voluminous. The evidence shows the original or book cost of this property, the market value of land, and estimates of the cost of reproduction new of the other physical property constituting appellee's telephone plant. There was also evidence of the condition of the property, together with estimates of accrued depreciation. Appellants submitted no valuations since one made by the commission in 1923[6] but presented detailed criticisms of appellee's estimates. The district court found that the method adopted by appellee's witness in ascertaining the cost of reproduction new was reliable and that appellee's estimates were substantially correct. The court encountered difficulties in making its valuations for the years 1931 and 1932. It took notice of the general fall in values which had accompanied the depression in business. And for that reason, the court fixed values for 1931 and 1932 which in its opinion gave due consideration to the element of the present decline. The court found that the fair rate of depreciation to be applied to reproduction cost new was 16 percent for the years 1923 to 1928, inclusive, and 15 percent for the succeeding years; and that the amount to be added to reproduction cost new on account of going value was 8 percent of that cost. The court also made findings as to the appellee's working cash capital, the amounts invested in materials and supplies and in property in course of construction, and as to these three items there is no controversy.

The court's findings, for each year, of the fair value of appellee's property, used and useful in its intrastate business in the Chicago area, including working cash capital, materials and supplies, construction work in progress, and going value, taking the average amount for the year, and the court's findings as to the original or average book cost of the same property, but without going value, are as follows:

	Fair value	Book cost
1923	$124,200,000	$95,074,135
1924	136,500,000	105,291,980
1925	148,500,000	117,730,536
1926	151,500,000	130,857,355
1927	167,000,000	146,173,197
1928	173,000,000	159,622,212
1929	184,000,000	168,988,816
1930	187,120,000	178,157,620
1931	179,100,000	181,925,963
1932	166,500,000	181,925,963

Appellants contend that the findings as to fair value are excessive. Appellee insists that they are too low. In particular, appellee says that the property was undervalued through excessive deductions for existing depreciation. Appellee maintains that the evidence shows a maximum depreciation of 9 percent for the years 1923 to 1928 and of 8 percent thereafter, instead of the 16 percent and 15 percent deducted by the court.

In computing the net revenue from the intrastate business in Chicago the court made adjustments in operating expenses with respect to the payments to the Western Electric Co. and the Amer-

[1] The order reduced rates for four classes of coin-box service. Otherwise it kept in force the rates which were fixed by an order of December 20, 1920. The coin boxes are in private residences and places of business and are not public pay stations.

[2] It appears that in 1923 there was used in the intrastate service approximately 95 percent of appellee's total property in the Chicago area. This percentage progressively decreased in the succeeding years, and in 1931 was somewhat less than 91 percent.

[3] The amounts of net revenue thus involved, which appellants contend should not have been allocated (under the rates in suit) to the interstate service for the respective years, are as follows: 1923, $245,042; 1924, $262,393; 1925, $309,505; 1926, $317,915; 1927, $354,372; 1928, $427,655; 1929, $486,875; 1930, $472,469; 1931, $437,580.

[4] Appellee states that this effected a reduction in the operating expenses of appellee of $67,167 for the last 2 months of 1930, $332,470 for 1931, and an equal amount for 1932.

[5] The amounts of the license payments thus disallowed by the court, as being in excess of the cost of the service, for the years 1923 to 1928, inclusive, are as follows: 1923, $573,819; 1924, $631,549; 1925, $531,233; 1926, $432,704; 1927, $558,011; 1928, $31,553. The amounts by which the cost to the American Co. exceeded the license payments, for the years 1929 to 1931, are as follows: 1929, $206,253; 1930, $327,751; 1931, $234,104.

ican Co., as above stated, and also reduced to some extent the annual charges for depreciation. By these adjustments the amount of the net revenue as found by the court largely exceeded that shown by appellee's books. For example, the amount available for return in the year 1923 under the existing rates appears to have been $5,347,533, according to appellee's books, while the amount found by the court to have been available for return in that year is $6,646,183. We shall presently refer to the comparison for the other years.

The court found that if the rates in suit had been effective appellee's net earnings on its intrastate business would have thereby been reduced to the extent of $1,541,668 for 1923 and by somewhat greater amounts in later years, except in 1931 and 1932. As thus estimated, the net revenue available for return from the intrastate business in Chicago under the rates in suit would have been as follows: 1923, $5,104,515; 1924, $5,932,959; 1925, $6,297,890; 1926, $6,402,128; 1927, $6,686,503; 1928, $6,914,459; 1929, $8,939,602; 1930, $8,492,385; 1931, $8,392,555; 1932, $6,750,000.

The court found that the fair rate of return on the average fair value of the intrastate property was 7½ percent for each of the years 1923 to 1927, inclusive; 7 percent for each of the years 1928, 1929, and 1930; 6½ percent for 1931; and 5½ percent for 1932. On the basis of these findings of fact the court concluded that the rates in suit were confiscatory at all times from the date of the commission's order.

1. The experience of the company under the existing rates: The effect of the decision below, and of the findings upon which it is based, strikingly appears if we put aside for the moment the rates in suit and consider that effect in relation to the existing rates under which the Illinois Co. has conducted its business since 1920. That is, if we compare the amounts available for return—the net intrastate income in Chicago under existing rates—as shown (1) by appellee's statement from its books and (2) by the court's adjustments, with (3) the amount of the net income which, under the findings of fair value, income, expenses, and rate of return, would be necessary to avoid confiscation. The following table—with columns correspondingly designated—gives the comparison: [7]

	First	Second	Third
1923	$5,347,533	$6,646,183	$9,315,000
1924	6,230,178	7,483,954	10,237,500
1925	6,650,718	7,880,451	11,137,500
1926	6,887,012	8,052,698	11,362,500
1927	6,877,089	8,363,580	12,525,000
1928	7,601,567	8,627,769	12,110,000
1929	9,490,091	10,679,602	12,880,000
1930	9,152,490	10,138,263	13,098,400
1931	8,494,616	9,826,299	11,641,500
1932	----------	8,000,000	9,157,500

On this showing, the findings if accepted would compel the conclusion that when the commission's order was made in 1923, not only the new rates, but the existing rates as well were grossly confiscatory; that appellee was receiving under the existing rates, according to its books, a net return of $5,347,533 when it was entitled to nearly $4,000,000 more, or $9,315,000, to prevent its property from being confiscated. The table shows a similar situation in the succeeding years. Again, the inference would be irresistible that the existing rates were confiscatory when they were prescribed by the Public Utilities Commission of Illinois (the predecessor of the present commission) in December 1920, to be effective January 1, 1921. In the comprehensive disclosure of appellee's financial condition there is nothing to permit an inference of any radical change which would have made rates, compensatory in 1921, confiscatory in 1923.

But, instead of challenging the existing rates as constituting an invasion of constitutional right, appellee when summoned by the commission, in September 1921, in the proceeding which led to the order now under review, asserted that the existing rates were just and reasonable. In its answer to the commission, appellee alleged that its rates and charges heretofore approved and authorized by the aforesaid order of the Public Utilities Commission of Illinois, entered on the 20th day of December 1920, and now in full force and effect, are just and reasonable, and that the burden of proof is upon whomsoever avers, or seeks to show, that said rates and charges are unjust or unreasonable. And when this suit was brought in September 1923 to prevent the enforcement of the new rates, appellee did not seek to enjoin the existing rates.

The financial history of the Illinois Co. repels the suggestion that during all these years it was suffering from confiscatory rates. Its capital stock rose from $9,000,000 in 1901 to $70,000,000 in 1923, $80,000,000 in 1925, $110,000,000 in 1927, $130,000,000 in 1929, and $150,000,000 in 1930. Its funded debt, which was somewhat less than $50,000,000 in 1923, continued at about the same amount until 1930. During this period appellee paid the interest on its debt and 8-percent dividends on its stock. Its fixed-capital reserves,[8] which embraced the depreciation reserve presently to be mentioned, rose from $37,575,004 in 1923 to $63,966,748 in 1930, and to $69,242,667 in 1931. The company's surplus and undivided profits over and above these capital reserves increased from $5,600,326 in 1923 to $22,907,654 in 1930 and to $23,767,381 in 1931. Its fixed capital—that is, the book cost of total plant and general equipment—which was $145,984,084 at the end of 1923, increased to $288,381,090 at the end of 1930, and to $291,259,580 at the end of 1931.[9] We do not lose sight of the fact that this showing embraces the entire business of the Illinois Co., both interstate and intrastate. But it appears that the intrastate investment in the Chicago area approximated 60 percent of the entire investment of appellee in the State. The book cost of the plant in service and general equipment in intrastate business in Chicago increased from $95,582,266 at the end of 1923 to $174,160,314 at the end of 1930, and to $177,334,652 at the end of 1931.[10] "The gross additions" to the company's property in the Chicago area, the company states, "were spread fairly evenly over the period. The business expanded with great rapidity. The number of telephones in Chicago increased from 690,000 at the end of 1923 to 940,000 at the end of 1931, and was 987,000 at the peak in 1929." During the 9 years a greater amount of plant was added new to the property than was in service at the beginning of the term. The company informs us that the property was kept at a high and even standard of maintenance throughout the years involved, and was at all times capable of giving adequate telephone service abreast of the art. The property has been efficiently and economically operated and the company has enjoyed excellent credit.

This actual experience of the company is more convincing than tabulations of estimates. In the face of that experience, we are unable to conclude that the company has been operating under confiscatory intrastate rates. Yet, as we have said, the conclusion that the existing rates have been confiscatory—and grossly confiscatory—would be inescapable, if the findings below were accepted. In that event the company would not only be entitled to resist reduction through the rates in suit, but to demand, as a constitutional right, a large increase over the rates which have enabled it to operate with outstanding success. Elaborate calculations which are at war with realities are of no avail. The glaring incongruity between the effect of the findings below as to the amounts of return that must be available in order to avoid confiscation and the actual results of the company's business makes it impossible to accept those findings as a basis of decision.

2. The effect of the reduction through the rates in suit: The foregoing considerations limit our inquiry. It is not necessary to traverse the wide field of controversy to which we are invited and to review the host of contested points presented by counsel. In the view that the existing rates cannot be regarded as inadequate, the question is simply as to the effect of the reduction in net income by the rates in suit. The question is whether the company has established, with the clarity and definiteness befitting the cause, that this reduction would bring about confiscation (Los Angeles Gas Co. v. Railroad Commission, 289 U.S. 287, 304, 305). The amounts of the reduction for the respective years are not in dispute.[11] It would have been $1,541,668 for 1923, would have been greatest at $1,740,000 for 1929, and least at $1,270,000 for 1932.

Operating expenses: In determining the effect of these reductions and what amounts would still be available to the company for net return, we come to the questions raised by the company's charges to operating expenses. Charges to operating expenses may be as important as valuations of property. Thus excessive charges of $1,500,000 to operating expenses would be the equivalent of 6 percent on $25,000,000 in a rate base. In this instance, against the reductions which the rates in suit would have effected, are the considerable sums which would be added to the amounts available for return by the adjustments in operating expenses made by the district court.[12] These adjustments embraced overpayments found to have been made by the Illinois Co. in its transactions with the American Telegraph & Telephone Co. and the Western Electric Co. In 1923 the overpayment to the former company, treating its outlay or the cost of its service to its subsidiary as the measure of the operating expense, was found to be $573,819; the average of the annual overpayments, as found for the years 1923 to 1927, inclusive, amounted to $545,443.[13] It should be noted that on the same basis of adjustment there would have been an increase (averaging $256,036) in operating expenses for the years 1929 to 1931, when the cost of the service exceeded the license payments.[14] The court below found overpayments to the Western Electric Co.

[7] Column (1) gives the net intrastate income in Chicago, as shown by the company from its books; column (2) the amount as adjusted by the district court; and column (3) the amount required by the court's findings.

[8] The fixed-capital reserves are the depreciation reserve and the reserve for amortization of intangible capital. The latter reserve ranged from $182,041.50, in the year 1923, to $274,086.36 in 1930, and to $289,018.77 in 1931.

[9] This is according to the company's plant and general equipment accounts for the Chicago and State areas.

[10] The book cost of the plant in service and general equipment for the Chicago area, including both interstate and intrastate business, rose from $100,040,051 at the end of 1923 to $191,286,165 at the end of 1930 and to $195,422,113 at the end of 1931.

of $332,470 in 1931 and 1932, respectively.[15] There are numerous contentions presented by each of the parties in relation to these adjustments—by appellants to decrease, and by appellee to increase, the amounts of expense allowed—but we shall not undertake to pass upon them in view of the determinative nature, for the present purpose, of the remaining question as to the sums which the company has annually charged to operating expenses for depreciation.

Annual allowances for depreciation: The commission, in the order under review, concluded that the depreciation reserve (amounting, at the end of 1922, for the Chicago property, interstate and intrastate, to about $26,000,000) had been built up by annual additions that were in excess of the amounts required. The commission provided for a combined maintenance and replacement allowance which it considered sufficient to protect the investment in the property and to permit the company to accrue a reserve in the anticipation of property retirements. On the first hearing the district court considered that the effect of that ruling was to reduce the amount charged for depreciation to the operating expenses in 1923 to the extent of about $1,800,000.[16] The company did not comply with the commission's requirement, but continued its own method of computing the annual allowances. We adverted to this question on the former appeal. We said that the recognition of the ownership of the property represented by the depreciation reserve did not justify the continuance of excessive charges to operating expenses. We thought that the experience of the Illinois Co., together with a careful analysis of the results shown under comparable conditions by other companies which are part of the Bell system, should afford a sound basis for judgment as to the amount which in fairness both to public and private interest should be allowed as an annual charge (282 U.S., pp. 157–159). The district court, in making its findings, stated that it had considered the data to which we referred, but we are not advised as to the precise method of its calculations.[17] The annual amounts allowed by the court for depreciation, as compared with those which appellee charged on its books to operating expenses,[18] are as follows:

	Court's allowances	Book charges
1923	$4,000,000	$4,222,000
1924	4,250,000	4,470,000
1925	4,750,000	5,048,000
1926	5,400,000	5,767,000
1927	6,000,000	6,335,000
1928	6,650,000	7,009,000
1929	7,000,000	7,436,000
1930	7,200,000	7,865,000
1931	7,400,000	8,133,000

Broadly speaking, depreciation is the loss, not restored by current maintenance, which is due to all the factors causing the ultimate retirement of the property. These factors embrace wear and tear, decay, inadequacy, and obsolescence.[19] Annual depreciation is the loss which takes place in a year. In determining reasonable rates for supplying public service it is proper to include in the operating expenses—that is, in the cost of producing the service—an allowance for consumption of capital in order to maintain the integrity of the investment in the service rendered.[20] The amount necessary to be provided annually for this purpose is the subject of estimate and computation. In this instance the company has used the straight-line method of computation, a method approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. (177 I.C.C., pp. 408, 413.) By this method the annual depreciation charge is obtained by dividing the estimated service value by the number of years of estimated service life. The method is designed to spread evenly over the service life of the property the loss which is realized when the property is ultimately retired from service. According to the principle of this accounting practice, the loss is computed upon the actual cost of the property as entered upon the books less the expected salvage, and the amount charged each year is one year's pro rata share of the total amount.[21] Because of the many different classes of plant, some with long and some with short lives, some having large salvage and others little salvage or no salvage, and because of the large number of units of a class, the company employs averages—that is, average service life, average salvage of poles, of telephones, etc.

While property remains in the plant, the estimated depreciation rate is applied to the book cost and the resulting amounts are charged currently as expenses of operation. The same amounts are credited to the account for depreciation reserve, the "Reserve for accrued depreciation." When property is retired, its cost is taken out of the capital accounts, and its cost, less salvage, is taken out of the depreciation-reserve account. According to the practice of the company, the depreciation reserve is not held as a separate fund but is invested in plant and equipment. As the allowances for depreciation, credited to the depreciation-reserve account, are charged to operating expenses, the depreciation reserve invested in the property thus represents, at a given time, the amount of the investment which has been made out of the proceeds of telephone rates for the ostensible purpose of replacing capital consumed. If the predictions of service life were entirely accurate and retirements were made when and as these predictions were precisely fulfilled, the depreciation reserve would represent the consumption of capital, on a cost basis, according to the method which spreads that loss over the respective service periods. But if the amounts charged to operating expenses and credited to the account for depreciation reserve are excessive, to that extent subscribers for the telephone service are required to provide, in effect, capital contributions, not to make good losses incurred by the utility in the service rendered and thus to keep its investment unimpaired, but to secure additional plant and equipment upon which the utility expects a return.

Confiscation being the issue, the company has the burden of making a convincing showing that the amounts it has charged to operating expenses for depreciation have not been excessive. That burden is not sustained by proof that its general accounting system has been correct. The calculations are mathematical, but the predictions underlying them are essentially matters of opinion.[22] They proceed from studies of the behavior of large groups of items. These studies are beset with a host of perplexing problems. Their determination involves the examination of many variable elements and opportunities for excessive allowances, even under a correct system of accounting, are always present. The necessity of checking the results is not questioned. The predictions must meet the controlling test of experience.

In this instance the evidence of expert computations of the amounts required for annual allowances does not stand alone. In striking contrast is the proof of the actual condition of the plant as maintained—proof which the company strongly emphasizes as complete and indisputable in its sharp criticism of the amount of accrued depreciation found by the district court in valuing the property. The company insists that the existing depreciation in the property, physical and functional, does not exceed 9 percent in the years 1923 to 1928 and 8 perecent thereafter. The existing depreciation as thus asserted by the company, and the amounts it shows as the depreciation reserve allocated to the intrastate business in Chicago (taking in each case the average amounts per year), are as follows:

1923	$11,992,000	$26,797,000
1924	12,865,000	29,316,000
1925	13,775,000	32,155,000
1926	14,621,000	35,572,000
1927	15,360,000	39,352,000
1928	16,241,000	42,769,000
1929	15,300,000	44,515,000
1930	15,863,000	45,829,000
1931	15,828,000	48,362,000

[1] The company obtains these average amounts from the total Chicago depreciation reserve at the end of each year, multiplied by the percentage found to be applicable to the intrastate business, with a deduction of one half of the increase during the year in order to obtain the average. The balance in the depreciation reserve for the entire Chicago property, interstate and intrastate, increased from $4,384,828 at the end of 1911 to $29,306,122 at the end of 1923.

[18] The company's charges on its books were based on original cost. The company claims considerably larger amounts as the result of recomputations for each class of property according to its replacement value new.

[19] Depreciation, as defined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, "is the loss in service value not restored by current maintenance and incurred in connection with the consumption or prospective retirement of property in the course of service from causes against which the carrier is not protected by insurance, which are known to be in current operation, and whose effect can be forecast with a reasonable approach to accuracy" (177 I.C.C., p. 422).

[21] See 177 I.C.C., pp. 451, et seq.

[22] In the exposition in evidence, to which the company's counsel refers in their argument, of the straight-line depreciation practice of the companies in the Bell system, it is said: "The proper interpretation of the data regarding plant life and salvage obtainable from accounts, records, and statistics is of equal importance with the integrity of the data themselves. It would seem that we should have first: Investigations of past service life and salvage through sound accounting and statistical methods; second, investigations of the conditions surrounding the employment of such plant in the past and of the extent to which such conditions still prevail; third, the best possible forecast of conditions looming in the future which should exert a modifying influence upon either life or salvage. And then the active judgment which fuses the experience of the past, so far as it is still pertinent, and the expectation for the future, so far as it is presently pertinent, into a just and reasonable determination of the current rate of depreciation for the time being."

In explanation of this large difference, the company urges that the depreciation reserve in a given year does not purport to measure the actual depreciation at that time; that there is no regularity in the development of depreciation; that it does not proceed in accordance with any fixed rule; that as to a very large part of the property there is no way of predicting the extent to which there will be impairment in a particular year. Many different causes operating differently at different times with respect to different sorts of property produce the ultimate loss against which protection is sought. As the accruals to the depreciation reserve are the result of calculations which are designed evenly to distribute the loss over estimated service life, the accounting reserve will ordinarily be in excess of the actual depreciation. Further, there are the special conditions of a growing plant—there are new plant groups in operation on which depreciation is accruing but which are not yet represented, or are but slightly represented, in the retirement losses. Where, as in this instance, there has been a rapid growth, retirements at one point of time will relate for the most part to the smaller preceding plant, while the depreciation reserve account is currently building up to meet the increased eventual retirement liability of the enlarged plant.

Giving full weight to these considerations, we are not persuaded that they are adequate to explain the great disparity which the evidence reveals. As the company's counsel say: "The reserve balance and the actual depreciation at any time can be compared only after examining the property to ascertain its condition; the depreciation, physical and functional, thus found can be measured in dollars and the amount compared with the reserve." Here we are dealing not simply with a particular year but with a period of many years—a fairly long range of experience—and with careful and detailed examinations made both at the beginning and near the end of that period. The showing of the condition of the property, and of the way in which it has been maintained, puts the matter in a strong light. In substance, the company tells us: The property in Chicago is a modern Bell-system plant. Through the process of current maintenance, worn, damaged, or otherwise defective parts were being constantly removed before their impairment affected the telephone service. The factors of inadequacy and obsolescence were continuously anticipated by the company so that the telephone service might not be impaired, and no depreciation of that character was ever present in the plant, except to the slight extent that obsolete items of plant were found, as stated by the company's witnesses.

One of these witnesses testified that, in his examination of the plant to determine existing depreciation, he understood that anything that was obsolete or inadequate was to be depreciated accordingly. We are told by the company that in that investigation "condition new was assumed to be free from defects or impairment of any kind—that is, perfect, or 100 percent condition—and the thing as it stood in actual use in the plant was compard with the same thing new. All existing depreciation, both physical and functional, was reduced to a percentage and subtracted from 100 percent. The service measured up to the standards of the telephone art at all times. The plant capable of giving such service was not functionally deficient in any practical sense. This is not to say that parts of the plant did not from time to time become inadequate or obsolete, but that the company continuously anticipates and forestalls inadequacy and obsolescence. Before a thing becomes inadequate or obsolete it is removed from the plant. But little variation was found in the percentage of existing depreciation during the years 1923 to 1931.[23] The company points out that the commission found, in its order of 1923, that the property was then in at least 90 percent condition. The weighted total or overall condition, the company shows, is 91 percent for the years 1923–28 and 92 percent for subsequent years.

This condition, kept at a nearly constant level, directs attention to the amounts expended for current maintenance. In the process of current maintenance, new parts are installed to replace old parts in units of property not retired. Such substitutions or repairs are separate from the amounts which figure in the depreciation reserve. The distinction between expenses for current maintenance and depreciation is theoretically clear. Depreciation is defined as the expense occasioned by the using up of physical property employed as fixed capital; current maintenance, as the expense occasioned in keeping the physical property in the condition required for continued use during its service life. But it is evident that the distinction is a difficult one to observe in practice with scientific precision, and that outlays for maintenance charged to current expenses may involve many substitutions of new for old parts which tend to keep down accrued depreciation. The amounts charged by the company to current maintenance year by year, the amounts credited to the depreciation reserve, and the total of the two sets of charges to operating expenses for the intrastate property in Chicago are as follows:

Year	Current maintenance	Depreciation	Total
1923	$5,643,623	$4,222,000	$9,865,623
1924	6,043,737	4,470,000	10,513,737
1925	6,563,193	5,048,000	11,611,193
1926	7,714,364	5,767,000	13,481,364
1927	8,849,550	6,335,000	15,184,550
1928	9,941,143	7,009,000	16,950,143
1929	10,671,576	7,436,000	18,107,576
1930	11,372,858	7,865,000	19,237,858
1931	10,842,053	8,133,000	18,975,053

These aggregate amounts range from over 30 percent to nearly 40 percent of the total amounts charged by the company to operating expenses.[24]

In the light of the evidence as to the expenditures for current maintenance and the proved condition of the property—in the face of the disparity between the actual extent of depreciation, as ascertained according to the comprehensive standards used by the company's witnesses and the amount of the depreciation reserve—it cannot be said that the company has established that the reserve merely represents the consumption of capital in the service rendered. Rather, it appears that the depreciation reserve to a large extent represents provision for capital additions, over and above the amount required to cover capital consumption. This excess in the balance of the reserve account has been built up by excessive annual allowances for depreciation charged to operating expenses.

In answer to appellants' criticism, the company suggests that an adjustment might be made by giving credit in favor of the telephone users in an amount equal to 3½ percent upon the difference between the depreciation reserve and the amount deducted from the valuation for existing depreciation. The suggestion is beside the point. The point is as to the necessity for the annual charges for depreciation, as made or claimed by the company, in order to avoid confiscation through the rates in suit. On that point the company has the burden of proof. We find that this burden has not been sustained. Nor is the result changed by figuring the allowances at the somewhat reduced amounts fixed by the court below.[25]

We find this point to be a critical one. The questionable amounts annually charged to operating expenses for depreciation are large enough to destroy any basis for holding that it has been convincingly shown that the reduction in income through the rates in suit would produce confiscation.

The case has long been pending and should be brought to an end. The company has had abundant opportunity to establish its contentions. In seeking to do so, the company has submitted elaborate estimates and computations, but these have overshot the mark. Proving too much, they fail of the intended effect. It is not the function of the court to attempt to construct out of this voluminous record independent calculations to invalidate the challenged rates. It is enough that the rates have been established by competent authority and that their invalidity has not been satisfactorily proved.

The decree below is reversed, and the cause is remanded with direction to dissolve the interlocutory injunction, to provide for the refunding, in accordance with the terms of that injunction and of the bonds given pursuant thereto, of the amounts charged by the company in excess of the rates in suit, and to dismiss the bill of complaint.

No. 548. The appeal of the company: The company was successful in the district court and has no right of appeal from the decree in its favor. The company is not entitled to prosecute such an appeal for the purpose of procuring a review of the findings of the court below with respect to the value of the company's property or the other findings of which it complains. Its contentions in these respects have been considered in connection with the appeal of the State authorities and the city. The appeal of the company is dismissed (New York Telephone Co. v. Maltbie, 291 U.S. —, Feb. 19, 1934). Decree in no. 440 reversed. Appeal in no. 548 dismissed.

MOTHER'S DAY STAMP—ADDRESS BY POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, tomorrow motherhood, the most sacred of all our worldly associations, is to be [23] Referring to the period 1923 to 1931, and to the company's exhibit, the company's counsel state that the percentage of depreciation in the various classes of plant did not vary materially during the period, with the exception of three classes, namely, central-office equipment, private-branch exchanges and booths and special fittings. In the case of central-office equipment there were large installations of new equipment in 1929, which had the effect of raising the percent condition for the entire class from 92 percent for prior years to 93 percent for 1929 and subsequent years. In the case of private-branch exchanges the percentage condition improved gradually from 88 percent in 1923 to 94 percent in 1930, due to the large proportion of new installations and correspondingly large retirements of the old. In the case of booths and special fittings, the percentage condition gradually improved from 78 percent in 1923 to 85 percent at the end of the period, in this case also because of abnormally large changes of booths at pay stations. These are the changes which in the main account for the fact that the overall condition of the plant rose from 91 percent for the years 1923–28 to 92 percent thereafter.

[24] The total amounts charged by the company for operating expenses in the intrastate business at Chicago appear to be as follows: 1923, $31,550,286; 1924, $33,275,574; 1925, $35,649,160; 1926, $38,893,042; 1927, $42,142,649; 1928, $45,704,899; 1929, $48,439,647; 1930, $49,319,993; 1931, $47,904,196.

honored by the Government by the issuance of a stamp by the Post Office Department. The picture on the stamp is a replica of Whistler's "Portrait of My Mother."

President Wilson 20 years ago established Mother's Day by formal proclamation; and the issuance of this stamp dedicated to motherhood is the outgrowth of the recognition given by our late President, Woodrow Wilson.

I present for the RECORD an address broadcast yesterday by Hon. James A. Farley, Postmaster General, in which he pays a beautiful tribute to the sacredness of motherhood. I ask that it be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In memory and in honor of the mothers of America the Post Office Department will, on May 2, of this year, for the first time in all history, place on sale at Washington, the Capital of the Nation, a new postage stamp dedicated to motherhood.

In size, approximately the same as the special-delivery stamp, with which everyone is familiar, it will be a substitute, until the printings are exhausted, for the ordinary 3-cent stamp.

It is purple in color—an exquisite example of the engraver's art—and bears as a central motif the figure of mother, inspired by the likeness appearing on the world-famous painting, Portrait of My Mother, by that most distinguished of American painters, James Abbott McNeill Whistler.

Twenty years ago, on May 12, Woodrow Wilson, then President of the United States, by formal proclamation, established Mother's Day as a national occasion of tribute to motherhood. Tonight I feel grateful that I have been privileged as Postmaster General to be the official instrument by which the post-office system of the United States, the greatest and most far-flung single business in all the world, indeed, in all history, has issued the order paying this tribute to the mothers of America.

I take a deeper satisfaction, if that were possible, in the fact that President Franklin D. Roosevelt, following in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor, Woodrow Wilson, has given evidence of his complete devotion to this comprehensive sentiment of obligation, respect, and love for motherhood, which we all feel, by himself selecting the design.

When it was decided to issue this stamp, to do this honor to the women whose heartstrings have vibrated for each and all of us, I turned to the President for advice and instruction. Upon his suggestion the Whistler painting, now ranked among the most notable artistic achievements of all time, provides the central figure of the design.

It is a source of pride to me that of all the postal systems of the world ours is the first to do this honor to the supreme mission of womanhood and that an American painter should have been the author of the pictorial ideal which is the central theme of the stamp.

Not without significance is the fact that this portrait has long been given an honored place in the Louvre at Paris.

Greatest, perhaps, of all the art galleries of the world, it has held forth to the admiration of the sons and daughters of all nations a portrait of an American mother by an American son.

So great is the interest attracted by this wonderful painting that it has been brought to this country where it has been exhibited in some of the art galleries of our larger cities. It is at present being displayed in the Museum of Fine Arts at Boston.

It inspires one to recall that here, on this soil, were born the woman and the son to whom all the world now does honor.

And who shall say which the world shall honor most, the mother or the son? The mother whose suffering, whose devotion, whose patient care made possible the character and genius of the son, or the boy whose adherence to the tenets of maternal training, whose loyalty and gratitude for his mother's sacrifice, found their supreme expression in a work that takes its place among the greatest artistic works of human genius.

That mother, whose portrait on the new stamp will, in a few days, enter millions of homes here and abroad, was an American mother. She was filled with the same emotions, the same hopes, the same aspirations that throb in the hearts of every mother in all this land.

There is no son, there is no daughter anywhere in all the United States, indeed in all this world, who cannot rely on the same deep love that nurtured the great Whistler.

Mother love, the love of the mother for the child and of the child for the mother, is the very core of our civilization. This is the source of loyalty. This is the source of the spirit of sacrifice. This is the source of the spirit of cooperation; and it is loyalty, sacrifice, and cooperation that have made America great.

I am happy that it has fallen to my lot to participate in this tribute to motherhood, a tribute that must of necessity include the family. Brothers and sisters, and father, all gather around the hearthstone on which mother is enshrined, and the hearthstone is the center of the family.

There in the home are performed the homely duties and developed the homely ties—observe the words, "the homely duties and the homely ties"—which unite every family, and which, uniting the family, in turn unite the city, the State, and the Nation.

It is not the luxuries of life, nor yet the personal triumphs that build the family, the State, and the Nation, but the sacrifices one for another and all for the common good. In that direction mother points the way.

I think it particularly appropriate that at this time, when, throughout the Nation, we have the opportunity of sounding the depths of sacrifice and cooperation, the occasion of honoring motherhood should be presented. Certainly there never was a time in all the history of the American people when we needed more to take to heart the lessons that motherhood teaches.

In every hamlet throughout this land tonight there are mothers whose every thought at this very moment is for the welfare, not of themselves but of their children. Under the roof-tree of every home is the chair of the mother whose heart beats now or in the past was unselfishly throbbing for the sons and daughters who, in their time, were to raise the families of the future.

We will celebrate Mother's Day, Sunday, May 13. May I suggest that it would be most appropriate and a manifestation of proper sentiment if every man and woman and boy and girl who is so fortunate as to have a living mother, would write that mother a special Mother's Day letter and place upon the envelop one of the new stamps. If possible, the letter should be so timed that it will be received on Mother's Day.

I know that there is not a mother in America whose heart would not thrill with such a remembrance. These special letters, adorned with the special stamp, will be kept among the real treasures of the mothers receiving them.

The first sheets of these new stamps were run through the presses of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing several days ago and the ceremonies incident to the first printing were most impressive.

Mrs. Roosevelt, the wife of our beloved President, herself typifying the finest in American motherhood, was the honor guest. It was my privilege to present her with the first sheet of stamps to come from the presses; and in doing so, I said to her:

"Mrs. Roosevelt, it is one of the great pleasures of my life to take a part in this ceremony incident to the first press run of the new postage stamp in tribute to the motherhood of America. What we are and what we expect to be is all due to mother, our best friend, to whom we may ever turn in time of trial or adversity for comfort and benediction."

In her brief response, Mrs. Roosevelt said: "I receive these stamps with a great deal of pleasure, and I am sure that this mothers' stamp will be one of the most popular issues we have had for a long time. This is a most beautiful stamp and I am sure that the mothers of America are most appreciative of the great honor that has been conferred upon them through the issuance of this stamp by the Post Office Department."

In approving the idea for a mothers' stamp and in selecting Whistler's masterpiece as the principal feature of its design, the President undoubtedly had in mind his own lovely and noble mother from whom he has received many of the qualities of mind and heart which have made him the great and beloved leader of the American people. Her tender devotion to him and his revered devotion to her are a constant inspiration to other mothers and other sons.

Provisions for 200,000,000 of the new stamps was made in the initial printing order. They will be placed on first-day sale at the philatelic agency at Washington May 2 and on the following day will be on sale at the post offices throughout the country.

Fortunate, indeed, is he who may tonight turn to his mother and pay her the tribute of devotion which we all feel but too infrequently express. He can tell her that he will repay her for all her sacrifice and care by similar devotion to the common cause of all humanity.

To him, however, who finds an empty chair on the hearthstone there must come the realization of opportunities that have been lost to give expression to what every heart feels.

To such I say, it is not for the present but for the future that your mother lived. It was not for the present but for the future that the mothers of the past have lived. It was not for personal and selfish good that they lived but for the welfare of their children. So, following their example, we of this generation, sons and daughters of America, secure in the knowledge of what they have done, may by similar devotion and sacrifice make easier the path of those who are to follow.

To the mothers of America, those who have gone before, those who now serve, and those who are to come, the Nation through the medium of this simple postage stamp offers its pledge of undivided loyalty and love.

RETAIL PRICE AND COST-OF-LIVING INDEXES

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, in the issue of the Railroad Trainman for April 1934 there is a very interesting and illuminating article on "Retail Price and Cost of Living Indexes." The retail-price and cost-of-living indexes are interesting because they have been used as the basis for the establishment of what is called a living wage. It is further interesting because Mr. Ethelbert Stewart, the author of the article, shows that the theory of a living wage originated in England at the time England emerged out of feudalism, when the laborers after feudalism had been granted a living wage based on the theory that if the wage of the laborer could be kept low enough or on the basis of his necessities of life, the overlord or the employer could have his labor cheaper than under slavery, because it was thought the free laborer or individual laborer could maintain himself cheaper than prior thereto when the underlords had maintained them in groups. Because of the rule used now to determine cost of living indexes, Mr. Stewart shows how absurd are the figures based upon that rule. I ask unanimous consent that his article may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Railroad Trainman, April 1934]

The retail-price and cost-of-living indexes as carried by the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics have to do, so far as that Bureau is concerned, only with the relation of living costs to wage rates. The origin of this idea, that is of its expression in economic literature, dates back to the days when England was emerging from feudalism and beginning to manufacture for export trade. It was believed that the lower the wages paid, the more export business could be secured. Besides, the laborers of the world had so recently come out from under slavery, a feudal form of slavery at least, it was believed that the individual could maintain himself on less proportionately than the overlord could maintain his laborers in groups; hence wages should be the least amount that would enable the laborer to subsist, and, if married, to rear another laborer to take his place when he was too old to work or was dead. This cold-blooded doctrine was written into our economic literature and is there yet.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics began the collection of retail prices of various foodstuffs, in a small way, a good many years ago; likewise, in a small way, it began collecting cost-of-living schedules or family budgets. Some of this work was done in 1901, retail prices even earlier. In 1918, at the request of the Shipping Board, the Bureau of Labor Statistics undertook a really wide-spread investigation into the cost of living in the principal shipbuilding centers. There is no doubt but that the Shipping Board intended and expected to prove that wages were too high and out of all proportion to cost of living, just as the original doctrine and theory were that a free laborer, having his mind on his own individual interests, could keep himself cheaper free than his master could keep him as a slave, and that if wages could be kept down to actual cost of living, free labor would be cheaper than slavery. But no matter what actuated the Shipping Board, the request was made, President Wilson allocated money from his defense fund to pay the cost, and the work was begun. So far as the Bureau of Labor Statistics was concerned, it was not worrying about economic doctrines or wage theories; it went to work at a statistical problem and its work was honestly, fairly, squarely, and efficiently done. The figures were not only honestly secured but tabulated, classified, and presented, and, so far as the cost of living can be statistically shown, this report represented conditions as they were in 1918 as nearly as is humanly possible by the statistical method.

The method of doing the work is briefly this: Trained agents of the Bureau visited personally 12,096 families in 92 varied localities and secured from the wife and other members of the family a detailed report upon a printed schedule furnished the agent by the Bureau, as to the quantity, quality, and cost of each thing purchased during the year. While on the face of it, it seems absurd that any housewife would know what she bought and what she paid for such a vast variety of things over a definite period of time, nevertheless it is true that a trained agent will get mighty close to the facts. The costs of the big items, like rent, coal, etc., are, of course, easy enough; and when it comes to the smaller matters, the quantities used are the great source of memory in determining cost. For instance, no tactful agent would ask a woman, "How much sugar did you buy in 1918 and how much did it cost you?" The agent asks, "How do you buy sugar?" and the answer comes "In 5-pound bags." "How long will a 5-pound bag last you?" "Ten days." "How about fruit season?" "Well, I only used 10 pounds, 2 bags of sugar, on fruits last year." The quantity of sugar used is thus mighty closely determined, and the price is not only fairly well remembered by the housewife but is checked up month by month by other agents from adjoining stores. Item by item the trained agent thus goes through the schedule with the housewife, who frequently refers to such "store books" as she may have. It is astonishing how well the ordinarily intelligent housewife knows where her money goes. When these schedules are all tabulated, it is found that the average family used 146 pounds of sugar in 1918; bought 397 loaves of white bread; 691 pounds of Irish potatoes, and so on through the long, long list. These quantities then become the weights or measures of the relative importance of things in household expenditures. An increase of 1 cent on a loaf of bread means an increase in the cost of living of $3.97 per year per family; an increase of 1 cent a pound in the retail price of potatoes means an increase of $6.91 in the cost of living, provided always that the quantity used was the same as it was in 1918. The total average expenditure for the 12,096 families was $1,434.37, and this became the index base, or 100. This was subdivided into six groups—food, clothing, rent, fuel and light, furniture and furnishings, and miscellaneous—and the average total for each group was the base, or 100, for that group. Thus, the total average expenditure for food by the 12,096 families was $548.51, and this is the base of the index, or 100. Retail prices were secured back to 1913, and applied to these quantities used in 1918 to give a 1913=100 base, because the Shipping Board wanted to get back to a pre-war cost of living. As a matter of fact, no 1913=100 base was ever established on a survey made during that year. The 1918 survey did not include any expenditure for automobiles, radios, victrolas, electric sweepers, and other electric household appliances, for the reason that the workers' families were not using those things in those days. Much that was considered good enough then would not be classed as even comfortable now. Nevertheless, the fact remains that we have had no survey, no record of standards, no "weights" since 1918.

These groups were further classified by percentages that each one was of the whole; that is to say, taking the number of families as a whole, and the expenditure for food was 38.2 percent of the total expenditure, clothing 16.6 percent, rent 13 percent, fuel and light, 5.2 percent, furniture and furnishings, 5.1 percent, miscellaneous, 21.3 percent. The lower the income, the greater the percentage of expenditure for food and the lower the percentage for miscellaneous. Take the groups of families with incomes less than $900, and 44.1 percent of their total expenditure was for food and 17.8 for miscellaneous; while the group of families with incomes between $2,100 and $2,500 spent 34.6 percent for food and 24.3 for miscellaneous. Miscellanea included streetcar fare, doctors' bills, daily papers, books, movies, and whatever of luxuries the family may have had.

Then the Bureau of Labor Statistics collects monthly prices on 43 articles of foodstuffs, not from all the 92 localities from which family budgets were secured in 1918 but from 52 of the principal cities of the country. The actual prices printed are the true prices of the month; the index, however, is a 1913 base, and the weighting to determine the effect of food-price changes on cost of living is on the weights of 1918. Once in 6 months—that is, in June and December—agents are sent out to get retail prices on the other items and groups of items, such as rent, clothing, furniture and furnishings, etc. These are not secured from the families but from the local merchants. The articles upon which prices are sought are the identical articles described in the schedules of 1918. On this subject the Bureau of Labor Statistics itself says (Bulletin 326, p. 15): "Prices of clothing, furniture, etc., are secured through the personal visits of agents, for two reasons: The articles in these groups are not standardized to the extent that articles of food are, neither can they be described so definitely as to be readily identified at all times. Besides this, the grade or quality, as well as the style of clothing, furniture, etc., is constantly changing and substitutions have to be made. It is absolutely essential to secure correct results that when such substitutions or changes must be made, the articles substituted must be as nearly as possible of the same quality or grade as the original article." That is the article described and priced in the family budget of 1918. I am not criticizing this as a statistical method; I am simply trying to show how utterly absurd, to use no stronger word, it is to use such "cost of living" in 1918 as a rule for adjusting wages in 1934. By the very methods described, it is impossible for the Bureau of Labor Statistics figures to show any improvement in standards of living, unless the articles used in 1918 are so utterly out of date that any possible substituted article would be an improvement.

To change the base from 1913 to 1926 makes the picture a little more understandable as to the figures themselves; but it must not be forgotten that however you shift the price base, the standard of living is that of 1918; no other family survey has been made to form a weighting to which to apply the price. Shifting the base to 1926 and taking a few cities notable as railway centers—Atlanta, Ga., for instance, on a 1926 base of 100, had a cost of living index of 74.2 in December 1933, all items considered; Chicago, an index of 72.1; Denver, 76.8; Kansas City, Mo., 77.2; New York City, 79.3; while for the United States as a whole it was 77.1. In the meantime, as against this decrease in cost of living (on a 1918 basis), the earnings of 57 percent of railroad men have been decreased 40 percent; nearly 50 percent have been entirely detached from pay rolls by furloughs. The whole national income since 1926 has dropped 46 percent, while wages and the smaller salaries have been cut 56 percent, and unemployment rose from 1,669,000 in 1926 to 12,000,000 in 1934. The whole system has been so shot to pieces since 1918 that it is absurd to talk about adjusting wages in 1934 on any figures of cost of living now in the possession of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, or anybody else.

Prices on identical things today, applied to the consumption figures or "weights" even of a year ago, are, in some instances, perfectly absurd. This applies particularly to fuel and to clothing. To illustrate by an actual personal case, in my home during February 1933 I had a contract price of 8½ cents per gallon for oil; my oil bill was $18.18; in February 1934 I had a contract price of 8¼ cents per gallon and my bill was $50.69. By any possible application of the Bureau of Labor Statistics methods, my cost of living for fuel was less in 1934 than in 1933, because the price was less. February 1933 was a mild, warm month; February 1934, the coldest ever known in the District of Columbia. The "consumption figures" of "weights" just did not match, that's all.

The latest figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics show a general increase in cost of living in all its branches, except rent. The general rise for the United States, as a whole, was 5.2 percent in December 1933 as against June 1933; in Atlanta, Ga., it was 5.2 percent; in Baltimore, 6 percent; Birmingham, 5.6; Buffalo, 4.8; Chicago, 3.8; Cincinnati, 4.1; Cleveland, 3.9; Denver, 3; Detroit, 6.4; Indianapolis, 4.8; Kansas City, Mo., 2.5; Minneapolis, 5.2; New Orleans, 5.1; New York, 4.9; Norfolk, 8; Philadelphia, 6.2; Pittsburgh, 4.5; Richmond, 6.5; St. Louis, 3.7; San Francisco, 4.9; and so on.

Last month the question of the wholesale-commodity price index was discussed, because, since it is to be made the basis of the content and volume of circulation of money, it seemed important that everybody should understand exactly what it means; likewise, since the cost of living index is still very much with us as a gage and a regulator of wage rates, since the railroads in 1934 insist upon using it as a basis for wage changes, and since Congress and the President in 1934 (A.D., mind you) insist on it as a basis for Government pay, everybody ought to know what it is and what it is worth as a wage argument.

SUBSISTENCE HOMESTEAD PROJECT, REEDSVILLE, W.VA.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an article which appeared in last Sunday's issue of the Washington Star, written by Grace Hendrick Eustis, concerning the Reedsville, W.Va., communistic project financed by Government funds. The article is accompanied by two photographs, one showing a girl weaving at the Morgantown, W.Va., commune, and I quote the caption of the other: "Bedroom furniture made by the unemployed miners at the Reedsville, W.Va., home-subsistence project."

From the article I quote the following:

The furniture, copied from designs brought to the project by Miss Nancy Cook, who runs the Vall-Kill Furniture Shop at Hyde Park for Mrs. Roosevelt, is made of pine and poplar, highly polished and waxed.

How does this fit in with Mrs. Roosevelt's and Secretary Ickes' statements that this was not a furniture factory but a plant to manufacture post-office boxes, as a "measuring rod on their cost"? Can it be possible that the author of this article is misinformed? Should she have seen Mrs. Roosevelt or Secretary Ickes before taking these pictures? Certainly her statement and the statements of Mrs. Roosevelt and Secretary Ickes are at odds. My information, gathered from articles I have read and conversations I have heard, coincides with this article from the Star. I call the article to the attention of Mrs. Roosevelt and Secretary Ickes.

Since Miss Nancy Cook runs Mrs. Roosevelt's furniture factory, why does she not autograph the furniture, she being the artist and designer? Why is Mrs. Roosevelt's autograph used?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star of Apr. 29, 1934]

By Grace Hendrick Eustis

The most striking parts of the exhibition of work done under the subsistence homestead projects, being shown at the Department of Commerce, are two completely furnished rooms. All the articles therein are made by the unemployed miners and their wives in the Reedsville, W.Va., experimental community of the division of subsistence homesteads.

The furniture, copied from designs brought to this project by Miss Nancy Cook, who runs the Vall-Kill furniture shop at Hyde Park for Mrs. Roosevelt, is made of pine and poplar, highly polished and waxed. There are gate-leg tables, chests of drawers, corner cabinets, Welsh cupboards, cribs for babies, double-decker beds for children, double beds for adults, and different varieties of chairs. They are hand made and strongly made by the men of the community. They possess considerable elegance.

WOMEN TAUGHT TO WEAVE

The women have been taught to weave. On the looms they have made carpets, coverlets for beds and chairs from cotton thread, blankets and material for dresses from wool. They have been instructed in the art of weaving by Mr. and Mrs. Shipley Brown. These two kindly people have left their home in Pennsylvania and are going to homestead in Reedsville with the miners so that they may teach them to work the looms and become, if possible, self-sustaining. The Society of Friends, who have long been working among the destitute miners, asked Mr. and Mrs. Brown if they would do this. True to their faith, they went unhesitatingly.

The loom is shown in one of the furnished rooms by Miss Elizabeth Elonies, of Annetsville, W.Va. She is working on a carpet. Mrs. Brown is exhibiting a knitting machine that can make a pair of socks in half an hour and a little girl's dress, both jumper and skirt, in 3½ hours. Enough wool to make the socks costs 9 cents, wool for the dress is 62 cents.

These two productions, the furniture making and the weaving, form the industry for the Reedsville project. Orders may be given for the furniture. The money made will go into developing the Reedsville Experimental Community.

$25,000,000 APPROPRIATED

The way these subsistence homesteads operate and their objective can be explained most simply by a description of Reedsville, which is approaching the starting point of its rehabilitation. Last July, under the National Recovery Act, $25,000,000 was appropriated for the subsistence homesteads. Thirty-five projects have been announced to date, extending from coast to coast and from Minnesota to Texas. The division of subsistence homesteads, which was established in the Department of the Interior under the direction of M. L. Wilson, hopes to create 50 projects. Each project gets its allocation of funds from the Washington division. Reedsville was given approximately $600,000. Their double objective is to take families off Federal or State relief pay rolls, make them self-supporting by creating an industry for them, if there is no nearby industry where they can work and to settle them on plots of land ranging from 1 to 5 acres where they can raise enough vegetables, fruit, poultry, possibly hogs and a cow to feed themselves.

1,000 FAMILIES APPLIED

Miss Virginia Wheatley, of Danville, Va., who has spent the winter in Reedsville, helping to start and organize this project, explained how the wheels were set in motion. After the number of families who could be taken care of in extent of land by the limitation of the allocation and the architectural planning of the project had been established, the weeding-out of applicants began. In Reedsville, for instance, where 125 families could be placed, 1,000 applied. The specifications for the families were that the age limit of the man must be between 25 and 30, that there must be at least 2 children and that the man must know something about farming. Both a physical and an oral examination were given, the first to prove that there was no tuberculosis and the second to find out how much the man knew about farming. He was asked such questions as, when would he feed sheep, how would he plant peas, where would he look for lice on chickens. The next step was a visit to the man's wife. She was asked whether she wanted to live on a small farm and whether she could do the canning. Finally the children were interviewed.

If it was ascertained that the whole family wanted to live in this way and they all passed the physical test, then the man started in working on the construction of his house and the making of the furniture and his wife began to learn how to weave and knit.

HOUSES MAY BE ENLARGED

Featured in this exhibition are the architectural plans for the houses and the community center at Reedsville. The architect is Eric Gugler, of New York. He has worked out an ingenious plan whereby the houses are attractive and can be added to, as a man's family increases, or he makes more money and wants to spread out, with very little expense. The original house has two rooms. The cost is $1,200. Two more rooms can be attached for $600 more, and still 2 more, making a 6-room house, may be added for $400. This makes a total expenditure of $2,200.

The community center is where the industrial life of the community will take place. Here will be the carpentry shop, the forge, and the looms. Plans are being made for community orchards and a sawmill.

On the same board on which Eric Gugler's houses are shown is a plan for a 2-acre homestead plot with gardens. Two thirds of an acre are devoted to an orchard with apple, pear, and peach trees. One fourth of an acre is for a rotating vegetable garden, one eighth of an acre for late corn, and other eighth for late potatoes. One half an acre is devoted to space for the home, a movable poultry house, and flower garden. Finally there is half an acre for the regular garden, in which can be grown sweet-potatoes, corn, cucumbers, melons, squash, okra, spinach, tomatoes, cabbages, peas, beans, radishes, onions, eggplant, parsnips, carrots, and asparagus.

It is claimed by the Department of the Interior that "1½ acres of good land is sufficient to produce all the vegetables, potatoes, and small fruits for the use of a family of five throughout the year."

MUNICIPAL DEBT READJUSTMENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5950) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not propose to consume much time in discussing the pending bill. I should like to see it passed as early as possible so the question may be finally decided. It has occasioned a great deal of anxiety and interest throughout the whole country. It is a very important measure.

The able presentation of the case yesterday by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] makes it unnecessary for me to dwell at any great length on the principles involved and the need for the legislation. I shall endeavor not to repeat the arguments which they so well and clearly and forcefully presented.

It is a matter not concerned entirely with 1 State or 2 or 3 States. It involves 42 States. A list of those States was furnished yesterday, and I shall not repeat it. There are 42 States deeply concerned in the measure. They must have aid in some form. It is believed this is the only form in which it can be adequately afforded. There must be some means of relieving the various communities in the 42 States from distress, from hopelessness; to restore, if possible, the vitality, the life, and the hope of the various communities involved.

The question involved is really a simple one. Of course, when we exhaust all other argument, the favorite reference to constitutionality of the measure is heard. I do not claim to be a constitutional lawyer or an expert on the Constitution. I practiced law about 30 years, and I did not quit because I had to. I think I know something of the Constitution and something of the law. In my opinion, for whatever it may be worth, the measure is constitutional. The fact that it is something new, that there is no precedent for it, is no argument against it. If it were not new, if there were plenty of precedents on the statute books, we probably would not need the legislation. I look upon the measure as a sign of growth; not something founded on ancient precedents, from which we can never get loose, but something that is evolving and growing; something that is found necessary to meet conditions as they arise, to meet circumstances and situations as they develop.

A few years ago I was at Fort Myer attending an airplane exhibition. The Wright brothers were there. I witnessed the launching of their plane. After some considerable difficulty they were able to push it off and get it into the air. I think it flew about 100 or 200 yards. I looked upon the airplane as a splendid idea, but thought it simply meant the development of a toy without any possibility of being useful for any particular purpose. That was the first venture of the Wright brothers in the airplane field. Today we see airplanes flying over the oceans, flying around the world, passing over the Andes, at a speed of nearly 200 miles an hour, carrying passengers, express, and mail across the continents. There is no limit to their development. It might have been argued that there was no precedent for that sort of thing, that it was not reasonable and not practical, and, therefore, we should not attempt it. The fact is the law must meet conditions as they arise. The law is growing and developing. The legalistic idea that it must be based entirely upon precedent ought to be discarded.

The question of constitutionality is one which, after all, can be settled only by the courts. Eventually the measure may come before the courts, and in testing its constitutionality the decision of the courts will settle the question. But in the meantime we believe there is provision in the Constitution for this kind of legislation. It is well thought out, well advised, well considered, and absolutely necessary to relieve conditions in many important communities of the country. The people cannot pay the taxes. They are in need of a little extension of time in order to reach some compromise, some adjustment, some composition which they are ordinarily willing to make. There are a few Shylocks who stand out and refuse to cooperate, demanding their pound of flesh and preventing settlements and adjustments which would ordinarily and reasonably follow. There must be some way of compelling, by decree of court, proper and reasonable and fair adjustment of the debt question.

I have in my hand a very able argument by Louis C. Ward on the Sumners bill for the relief and adjustment of debts of taxing districts. He sums up the situation in these words:

> It is necessary, workable, moral, constitutional, and well-studied legislation.

I shall not discuss the pamphlet nor Mr. Ward's argument in detail. Anyone can obtain a copy of the argument. In my judgment, he meets clearly and conclusively all the objections and criticisms which have been made to the bill. I should like to refer to one or two paragraphs in his argument, very briefly, in which he rather well sums up the situation. For instance, at page 41 of the pamphlet, he says:

> An intellectual critic argues: "If there is anything the Federal Government has not touched it is the municipality." The whole point to the legislation is that no power except the Federal Government can solve the problem because, written into our fundamental law, there is the power of Congress to pass a bankruptcy law. Precluded by the same Constitution is the power of the State to impair the obligations of a contract.

He concludes with this statement:

> Debt is the subject matter of the Sumners bill. An impoverished nation prays for debt relief.
> The House has passed the Sumners bill.
> The Senate can complete the work of passing a humane law, thereby deciding that "a man is more precious than gold", and that the interest of millions of taxpayers is paramount to the interest of a few bondholders who hypocritically parade the widow and orphan and place upon the national altar a sacred sewer bond for our worship.
> The immediate passage of the bill will prevent chaos in municipal and legal governmental financing.

There will be a good many deserted villages in the country unless something of this kind can be done to relieve the situation and give vitality and hope to the various communities which are so deeply concerned. The people cannot escape their obligations. They have no desire to repudiate them. There is no inclination to escape the payment of their debts while they are able to pay them and where it is possible for them to pay. They are taxed, however, almost to the limit. In many instances resort has been made to the courts. Any bondholder can go into court and bring suit, where his obligation is in default, and obtain a mandamus to compel the authorities of the municipality, for instance, to levy an assessment. The authorities make the levy. The taxpayers cannot pay the tax. In one instance, as I said yesterday, an assessment was levied to the amount of 425 mills on the actual value of the property for 1 year. In other words, an assessment made as required by the court amounted to 42½ percent of the entire value of the property. That meant that in 2 years the city taxes alone, without regard to the State and county taxes, would amount to the entire value of the property.

In those circumstances, what are the taxpayers to do? They simply lose their property. They suspend all payments. The bondholder gets nothing; the community gets nothing; the property depreciates in value, has no sale, no chance to realize anywhere, and there is a total loss. Involved in all this are expenses, attorneys' fees, and what not.

This bill provides a way whereby 75 percent of the creditors of a city or town, community or tax district, can arrive at a voluntary agreement or plan for the settlement of the debt. It may possibly involve some reduction of principal. It may involve a reduction of interest. It will involve postponement of maturities; but these people themselves voluntarily come together and agree upon a plan, and the city organization or municipality is in position to carry it out. At present, however, because some minority bondholder, who perhaps has bought his bond at reduced price, is not willing to agree, the whole thing is held up. In one instance which was cited yesterday a man bought a $5,000 city bond for $450 and proceeded to mandamus the city to levy an assessment.

The claim is made that the passage of the bill means that the Federal courts will supersede the State courts. There is nothing in that contention. The Federal courts already have jurisdiction to issue orders compelling the assessment of taxes. A Federal court has jurisdiction to go even further than that. It can issue an injunction for the protection of bondholders. For instance, a municipality that could not get tax money decided that it would accept its own bonds in payment of taxes. A taxpayer holding a city bond, unable to pay his taxes in cash, offered the city its own bond in payment. That was quite a good scheme, as the debt of the city would be reduced by accepting its own bonds for taxes. The plan seemed to work very well, and was going on satisfactorily in the community; but an outside bondholder came in and said, "That is not fair. That is not just to me. You cannot do that"; and he proceeded to obtain an injunction from a Federal court against the municipal authorities to restrain them from accepting their own bonds in payment of taxes.

So there is ample jurisdiction now, so far as that is concerned, in the Federal courts to handle these matters. While this bill provides for a Federal court enforcing the bankruptcy laws under certain conditions, 51 percent of the creditors have to file a petition and agree upon a plan in order to invoke the jurisdiction of the court. After that, 66⅔ percent of the creditors must agree, and then finally 75 percent of all the creditors must voluntarily agree upon the plan for settlement and adjustment of the debt; and in that case the court can put it into operation and effect.

Why is not that fair? Why is not that reasonable? What objection can there be to it except the notion that it is interfering in some way with contracts, or with the rights of individuals, or something of the kind? There is nothing to that argument. In my judgment this bill is absolutely fair and reasonable and just, and there is no question but that its enactment will accomplish a great deal of good.

I have before me an article printed in Today of February 24, 1934, entitled "Mortgaged Municipalities", by Frederick L. Bird. I ask that the article be inserted in the RECORD at the appropriate place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The article appears at the conclusion of Mr. FLETCHER'S remarks.)

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall not attempt to discuss the article, but I should like to refer to the two concluding paragraphs, as they seem so much in point.

Mr. Bird says:

> The great majority of bondholders are ready and willing to cooperate. Almost invariably municipalities are more than anxious to meet their obligations.

That is quite true. They want to meet their obligations.

> Large numbers of refunding plans have been worked out which are acceptable both to the municipalities involved and to the preponderance of their creditors. Yet in no important instance has it been possible to place such a plan fully in operation. The reason lies in the recalcitrance of small minorities of bondholders, often speculators who have bought up their holdings at low prices.
> To meet this situation and to avoid a repetition of the long years of expensive and destructive controversy which followed the disastrous flood of defaults in the 1870's, a bill was passed in the National House of Representative last June and is now pending in the Senate, which will make reasonable debt compromises possible. This bill, known both as the "Sumners bill" and the "Wilcox bill", provides, briefly, that a plan which has the approval of the municipality, of 75 percent of the creditors, and of the Federal district court, shall become binding upon the creditor minority.
> The passage of this bill should do more than any other single step to avoid years of expensive litigation and demoralizing confusion for our less fortunately situated municipalities. The great majority of local governments will have no need to resort to its aid, but it offers the most hopeful means of self-rehabilitation in those areas where the wreckage of the past must be cleared away.

The municipalities are not to blame for the situation, except as we may say that it was a great mistake in 1925, 1926, and on down to 1929, anyway, for us to suppose that everything was going to blossom according to our expectations and that the country was prosperous and getting more prosperous day after day. People were encouraged to go in debt on the installment plan. It was possible to buy anything from a toothpick to a locomotive on the installment basis; and people were buying, and urged to buy. They got into extravagant habits, and so did municipalities. They looked forward to continuous development and growth. They spent a large amount of money in paving, and in sidewalks, and in utility development, and in health programs, and all that sort of thing, schools and what not. They overbuilt. They contracted for expenditure of more money than they ought to have contracted for. That may have been a mistake of judgment. It was not dishonesty.

Then there came a turn in the tide of affairs and values went down. In October 1929 security values on the New York Stock Exchange shrank $29,000,000,000. In October 1930 they shrank $20,000,000,000 more. There was $49,000,000,000 of shrinkage in the value of securities. That affected everything, business everywhere, real estate, and everything else. Matters got so that the word "value" could not be identified with property at all. It was impossible to sell or dispose of it in any way; and so the values of real estate and other property in the various municipalities have dried up, though not through the fault of the municipalities.

Here is a city in which, when the bonds were issued, the taxable value of the property was $100,000,000. Today the value of that property is estimated at $17,000,000. It is due to no fault of the city; but there has been a shrinkage of values, and people cannot pay taxes on the basis of the old value.

So we must meet these conditions as best we can. There is no idea of repudiating debts, no idea of escaping obligations, but simply the suggestion that a court may, upon the application of a municipality, backed by its creditors to the amount of 75 percent, put into effect a compromise, a composition, an adjustment satisfactory to them, and effective so far as the municipality is concerned, restoring new life and new hope to the community, and bringing about a situation which is of immense importance to various communities and to the taxpayers generally as well as the creditors, for the benefit of the bondholders, and for the benefit of everybody concerned.

Why should not the court carry out a plan like that and not permit a minority holding securities for which perhaps they paid a very low price, purely as a matter of speculation, to prevent an adjustment of that kind?

I therefore wish to say, Mr. President—and with that I shall conclude—that I hope the Senate will adopt the substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], and that the bill, as amended by the substitute, will be passed by the Senate.

[From the Today of Feb. 24, 1934]

[Our cities are more than a billion dollars in default. What should be done about it?]

MORTGAGED MUNICIPALITIES

By Frederick L. Bird

One hundred and ninety-four thousand local governments in the United States began 1934 with a headache. In New York City it was a hangover from an 8-year spending spree; in most it was ceaseless worry about making both ends meet; in some it was a more painful financial malady that showed symptoms of becoming chronic.

Few, if any, American municipalities have escaped the financial ravages of 4 years of hard times. All have had the problem of how to reconcile declining revenues with increased costs of an emergency nature, and some have fallen so far short of an adequate solution as to become involved in financial confusion from which they may not be able to emerge for many years to come.

Sweeping headline references to our bankrupt cities, however, are a misleading attempt to generalize on the unfortunate predicament of a minority. So strong has become the obsession regarding the squandering of funds and the bungling of management by our municipal governments (thanks not so much to the limited validity of such beliefs as to the irrational assertions of those who apparently want the cost of public services conjured out of thin air) that there is a tendency to overlook the simple fact that our local government system, though somewhat the worse for wear, is still functioning.

Many municipalities, especially favored with capable, foresighted management, are as sound financially today as they were in 1929. The great majority have struggled through 4 years of declining fortunes with varying degrees of success. In many instances it has been at the expense of ruthless curtailment of budgets which has impaired essential functions and resulted in underpayment of personnel, or has involved such emergency devices as the use of scrip in payment of salaries and bills. In others it has been merely a case of muddling through.

Despite surprisingly zealous regard for the maintenance of municipal credit, in a period when private financial structures were tumbling on every hand, the casualties among local governments have been mounting and there are more to follow. With our entangled jungle of nearly 200,000 local areas of government, there is no means of knowing exactly how many have defaulted in payment on their debts. The most reliable estimates place the number at about 2,000. These places range in size from Detroit, Mich., to hundreds of rural counties, irrigation districts, school districts, and crossroads hamlets, and are scattered unevenly through most sections of the country. It is estimated also that of a total municipal indebtedness of $15,223,000,000, about $1,200,- 000,000, or 7.9 percent, is in default on principal or interest. Not since the panic of 1873, when probably one fifth of our municipal debt was in default, have our local governments encountered such a financial setback, and those were the days before the invention of budgets, borrowing limits, and other contrivances for the establishment of sound municipal finance.

Hundreds of municipalities, their budgets hopelessly out of balance, are bound to join the ranks of the defaulters in 1934 unless there is a rapid rise in ability and willingness to pay taxes, an increase in Federal and State aid, or the extension of easier credit whereby refunding bonds can be floated to pay off maturing obligations. While the devaluation of the dollar contemplates reduction of the load of public debt, it offers only uncertain value toward the meeting of municipal-debt obligations this year. The property valuations which make up the tax base have already been determined and the tax rates set. Hard-pressed cities, therefore, will have to place their immediate hopes on more dollars in the hands of their taxpayers and easier credit from bankers.

In attempting an analysis of the extent, severity, and causes of municipal financial ills, the most conspicuous characteristic is the uneven distribution of defaulting localities. Using as a basis for study the authoritative tabulation of 1,734 cities, counties, and districts in default compiled by the New York Bond Buyer, the fact stands out that in all New England there is a record of only four defaults. Moving down through the Atlantic States, New York has only 4, Pennsylvania 12, Virginia but 1, and Delaware and Maryland none. But looming up like a black spot on the map is New Jersey with 94. Other of the larger States with fewer than 10 are Kansas, Minnesota, Nebraska, Wisconsin, and West Virginia, the latter with a clean record under the State plan of centralized sinking fund administration.

At the other end of the list are five States which, with New Jersey, supply 53 percent of all the defaults. In Florida, where a solvent city is a rarity, there is a total of 324. North Carolina is a close second with 264. Ohio accounts for a generous share, 121; Texas is next in line with 105; and California follows close behind with 101, 74 defaulted irrigation districts being the major contributing factor. With the inclusion of the five remaining States showing 50 or more defaulted municipalities, Arkansas, Illinois, Kentucky, Michigan, and Tennessee, we have a concentration of 78 percent of the default list in 11 States with 38 percent of the country's population.

Here is a seemingly anomalous state of affairs. The uneven incidence of the depression affords a partial, but by no means complete, explanation. Bad laws, bad management, excessive borrowing, and short-sighted and sometimes vicious business and financial influences contribute an equally realistic interpretation.

Too much debt, to summarize the state of affairs succinctly, supplies the fundamental reason for the large majority of municipal defaults. Most frequently it is merely a case of too much debt to manage under present circumstances; but in some distressing instances it is a case of the accumulation of obligations which can never be fully met, unless by some improbable future turn in the wheel of fortune.

Notwithstanding the somewhat disconcerting increase in local debt it can hardly be asserted that $122 per capita—the national average—is beyond the average community's capacity to pay. The embarrassment lies rather in the unequal distribution, both in amount and in relation to wealth, and in the almost exclusive dependence upon the local general property tax for means of payment. Even a national-average debt is excessive for areas whose inhabitants never rise above the poverty level; and debt loads of twice the average are beyond the reasonable capacity to pay of any community, unless there are exceptional conditions of large, locally taxable wealth. Yet hundreds of such excessively burdened units exist, the bulk of them in default, with per capita debts twice, four times, and in extreme instances as high as eighty times the average figure.

The responsibility for the acquisition of these unwieldy debts rests by no means entirely with the local officials and citizens. Unfortunately, instead of being permitted to judge their own needs, they were preyed upon by powerful equipment interests and their satellite contractors who bedeviled or corrupted public officials or high pressured untutored publics into lavish and injudicious expenditures. Land speculators appropriated municipal borrowing power for their own promotional purposes; the extension of easy credit, with only the most perfunctory regard for the security involved, stimulated a veritable torrent of bond issues; and the failure of investors to apply even the most rudimentary criteria of safety facilitated the marketing of the most speculative municipal securities, so long as they bore the lure of tax exemption.

One choice example—a small mideastern community in default—will show why there is wreckage to be cleared after the storm. The realtors moved into this suburban area in the early 1920's, when its population numbered under a score; subdivided it by laying out several miles of cheaply surfaced streets and staking off building lots; induced purchasers by easy down payments and the promise to pay 3 years' taxes; and had it incorporated as a city. Maneuvering their own representatives into controlling official posts, they kept the tax rate down for the 3-year period, meanwhile using the city's public credit to finance extensive sewer and water systems and other physical requirements. At this point, the enterprise having proved a failure, they withdrew, neglecting thereafter to pay taxes on their still extensive holdings. Today, the somewhat confused inhabitants find themselves with a debt obligation of over $6,000 per capita and a total city income which covers less than half the interest requirements on the debt. Yet these bonds were marketed by highly regarded investment bankers and large quantities of them rest in the investment portfolios of institutional custodians of people's savings. Defaults of such stellar magnitude, fortunately enough, exist in only a limited number of areas outside of Florida; but the same characteristics, milder in degree, are complicating the financial difficulties of a large number of municipalities.

The use of public credit for land speculation, then, affords a veritable master key to understanding the heavy concentration of municipal defaults. Operating either exclusively, or in conjunction with other factors, it discloses the background, not merely of the Florida debacle, but of the financial collapse of hundreds of other local areas. Especially conspicuous has been the wholesale credit wrecking of Cleveland suburban communities, in one of which, for example, the realty interests primarily responsible are a million dollars in arrears in taxes and assessments. No less evident is the predicament of spectacularly promoted resort cities, particularly in North Carolina and in New Jersey. In Detroit and its metropolitan area, extravagant realty promotion played a prominent part in the undermining of public credit. In the West and South, drainage and irrigation districts are in default because of the inability of the farmers to meet the many debts incurred by the original promoters. Contributing to the financial weakness of local governments under such conditions are two depressing factors in addition to the burdensome public debt. Taxpaying capacity is diminished by the presence of an abnormal private mortgage debt, and abandoned subdivisions become a municipal liability, not only by driving down the assessed values on which taxes are based but by yielding insufficient tax revenues to pay their own public maintenance charges.

Especially vulnerable to business depressions, particularly in conjunction with high debt and a background of excessive realty inflation, are cities dominated by a single industry. When such an industry has overexpanded and is itself peculiarly susceptible to fluctuating demands, the financial stability of the cities dependent on it are doubly precarious. Detroit and its satellite automobile manufacturing cities; Akron, Ohio, with its rubber; Grand Rapids, Mich., as a furniture center; and Atlantic City, N.J., and Asheville, N.C., with their recreational "industries" are among the more important examples of places in default, partially because their sources of financial support have been more severely depleted than the average.

Contributing still further to the confusion regarding the status of municipal credit are the didn't-know-it-was-loaded casualties in civil divisions where the magnitude of the total local debt load went unrecognized until the crash came. The city debt, the school debt, the county debt, and the special district debt were all carried separately on the books of these independent but overlapping governments, and no one took the trouble to add the total which the same group of taxpayers had to carry. One hard-pressed suburban township, for example, felt full confidence in the moderation of its town debt of $217 per capita. But a belated investigation educed the alarming fact that its citizens were actually carrying a total local debt of $911 per capita. Most State-constituted legal borrowing limits have the same effect. They rarely take into account the duplication of local debts and sometimes permit deductions of a misleading nature. The State of New Jersey leads in this respect. Despite a nominal limitation of borrowing by cities to 7 percent of assessed valuation, the actual total local tax-supported debt in New Jersey municipalities of over 10,000 population averages in excess of 17 percent of assessed valuation and in some instances rises above 30 percent.

The underlying causes of default on municipal debt have been given particular attention with a view to showing the futility of overnight correction; but some of the more immediate influences are likewise not susceptible of swift elimination and call for constructive adjustments.

Decline in municipal revenues from year to year of the depression rendered fixed charges for debt service an ever-increasing proportion of the total, with a constantly dwindling margin for operating costs. In 1930 cities collected, on the average, 90 percent of their taxes; in 1933 they were struggling along on a bare 75 percent. The accumulated arrears constitute a largely realizable asset, often well in excess of defaulted bond principal and interest, but only slowly available unless recovery is unanticipatedly rapid and complete. The banking catastrophes of 1933 were the final straw for many municipalities, especially when an entire local banking system collapsed. Not only were public funds impounded, but the reserves of the taxpayers were thus depleted to the vanishing point. Again, irregularities in debt structure, with the unfortunate piling up of maturities at a time when revenues were showing an unforeseen decline, have frequently been a direct cause of default, even when the total debt was of very moderate proportions. Especially in Ohio, where strict requirements frequently call for retirement of 20 percent or more of a debt in a year, have defaults of this nature been prevalent.

Municipalities exist only incidentally as debt-paying entities. Their concern with credit and the maintenance of credit has to do with facilitating the socially and economically indispensable functions for which they have been evolved. The first objective of rehabilitation, therefore, is the conservation, or restoration, of municipal capacity to perform these functions on a plane compatible with a decent standard of civilized life. In the case of a bankrupt railroad or other private utility, this attitude is accepted without question, and it is fully as applicable to that vital group of public services which are embodied in our local governments. Even from the creditors' point of view, restored capacity to pay lies in maintaining the municipality as a going concern and in strengthening the morale of its taxpayers.

The great majority of bondholders are ready and willing to cooperate. Almost invariably municipalities are more than anxious to meet their obligations. Large numbers of refunding plans have been worked out which are acceptable both to the municipalities involved and to the preponderance of their creditors. Yet in no important instance has it been possible to place such a plan fully in operation. The reason lies in the recalcitrance of small minorities of bondholders, often speculators who have bought up their holdings at low prices.

To meet this situation and to avoid a repetition of the long years of expensive and destructive controversy which followed the disastrous flood of defaults in the 1870's, a bill was passed in the National House of Representatives last June, and is now pending in the Senate, which will make reasonable debt compromises possible. This bill, known both as the "Sumners bill" and the "Wilcox bill", provides, briefly, that a plan which has the approval of the municipality, of 75 percent of the creditors, and of the Federal District Court, shall become binding upon the creditor minority.

The passage of this bill should do more than any other single step to avoid years of expensive litigation and demoralizing confusion for our less fortunately situated municipalities. The great majority of local governments will have no need to resort to its aid, but it offers the most hopeful means of self-rehabilitation in those areas where the wreckage of the past must be cleared away.

Mr. HATFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to address the Senate on the pending bill briefly, and I should like to ask the Senator whether it would suit his convenience to postpone his address until after the pending bill shall have been acted upon.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I do not know when that time will be. Does the Senator from Arkansas feel that the bill will be disposed of in the very near future?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is my impression that it may be passed within an hour; but, of course, I can give no assurance as to that.

Mr. HATFIELD. Very well. I shall accede to the request of the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is very kind of the Senator to do so.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LEWIS. I reannounce, for the reasons then given, the absences of Senators as previously announced. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Ninety Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of Senators, only a brief period will be required for the expression of some views concerning the pending bill which I feel prompted to present to the Senate.

The measure before us is of very great importance. It has encountered serious opposition from various sources. It receives the support of many citizens and organizations.

The circumstances which make necessary legislation similar to that contemplated by the bill before us may be very briefly reviewed. They were stated in admirable detail by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] yesterday and also by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and other arguments, to which I may refer, were presented by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN].

More than 2,000 municipalities are in default in the payment of their obligations. That of itself is a complete answer to the objection which has been made to this bill on the ground that the enactment of the proposed legislation would impair the credit of those public corporations. Their credit has already been impaired. They are unable to meet their debts as they mature.

No other plan than the one now presented to the Senate has been proposed for the composition of the difficulties of these public corporations, and it is not likely that any other plan will be proposed. So, that Senators should understand that if anything is to be done pertaining to the difficulties referred to, it must be done now, and in connection with this bill. In all probability the subject will not be renewed, either during the present session or during a future session of the Congress, as there is no other plan proposed or in contemplation.

Mr. President, there is another class of public corporations that would be affected by the proposed legislation. It includes irrigation, drainage, and levee districts, and other taxing units. Hundreds of these districts are in default, and the properties within the districts are being subjected to processes for the enforcement of the obligations.

In 31 States there are drainage districts having large securities outstanding, and in many of these States there are some districts which are in default, due to the depression, as I may say in general terms. An effort has been made to provide relief as to this class of public corporations by providing a public fund, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, of $50,000,000, which was recently supplemented by an additional fund of $50,000,000 to enable the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to these districts for the purpose of effectuating adjustments that may be made respecting the indebtedness of the districts. It has been found impossible to complete these loans because of the fact that minority holders of the obligations of the districts seek to place themselves in a position of great advantage by declining to accept any compromise as to their claims, and by insisting on their payment in full; and if no arrangement such as that proposed in this bill shall be made, thousands of citizens will be deprived of their property, thousands will be driven from their homes, and a great national calamity inevitably will result.

Let me ask Senators what better plan can be devised than the plan now under consideration? If a better plan can be proposed, if one is in contemplation, let it be brought forward. But are we to permit this condition to continue with no proposal or effort to relieve the sufferings and the distress of those who find themselves in the situation of having their properties so greatly depreciated in value that they are insufficient to meet the first liens that have been imposed upon them by improvement districts and by other public corporations?

I repeat the question: What is to be done about the matter? If nothing is to be done, then we must face the consequences and our responsibility for them.

I know that one of the principal grounds of opposition urged is that the enactment of the proposed legislation will impair the credit of the public corporations involved. I have already said that as to those corporations in default and unable to meet their obligations, their credit is already impaired, and it will not be further impaired by making the best arrangement possible for meeting their obligations, which is exactly what it is proposed shall be done under the terms of the pending bill.

In the next place, the credit of public corporations which are not insolvent will not, in the long run, be impaired in the slightest degree, but rather, their credit will also be improved by the results of the application of the provisions of this bill.

A public corporation which is not insolvent and which is able to meet its obligations as they mature, will not be detrimentally affected in the long run as to its ability to make loans in the future, but the fact that a plan has been worked out which will enable insolvent public corporations of the classes embraced in this bill to discharge their responsibility fairly, will tend to strengthen the credit of public corporations, rather than to impair it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I confirm the Senator's observation with the simple exhibit that the Executive Committee of the Conference of Mayors of the United States, consisting of chief executives of leading municipalities of the country, not one of which is in default, is unanimously praying the Senate to approve this legislation on the theory that it is essential, precisely as the Senator from Arkansas indicates, for the preservation of municipal-bond credit as a common and complete structure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I thank the Senator for his contribution.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point data which have been supplied me respecting the situation of the drainage districts and their applications for loans. Legislation of this character must be enacted if the funds which have been made available for these districts are to be used, because they cannot be used so long as the minority bondholders are insisting upon the right to collect their claims as a whole, and refusing to enter into any composition or arrangement whatever for the adjustment of their obligations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The data referred to are as follows:

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I pass from the subject of credit to the question of the validity or constitutionality of the proposed statute. I know that subject has already been ably presented by other Senators, and I shall content myself with a very brief discussion of this phase of the measure.

In the first place, the objection has been raised that this bill does not constitute an exercise of the power of Congress to provide uniform bankruptcy laws, and yet it is identical in principle with acts passed during the last Congress relating to railroads and relating to farmers and farm organizations, and based upon the very same constitutional power upon which those statutes were rested.

The Supreme Court has in numerous cases held that the power of Congress to enact bankruptcy legislation is not limited to the enactment of that character of laws which were in existence at the time of the adoption of the Constitution or prior thereto, but that the authority of the Congress over the subject of bankruptcy is plenary.

"Bankruptcy" has many definitions, one of the primary definitions of a bankrupt being "a person unable to pay."

"Insolvency" likewise has many definitions. One of the primary definitions of insolvency is "the state of a person who is unable to meet his obligations as they mature."

So it is not necessary that an act of bankruptcy, as the Constitution has been interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States, must provide for a disposition or distribution of the bankrupt's property. It is sufficient, as stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Canada Southern Railway Co. v. Gebhard and Another, Executors (109 U.S. 527), that adjustments or arrangements for the settlement of the bankrupt's obligations shall be comprehended in the legislation.

It might be appropriate at this point to read from a brief filed with the committee in connection with this measure, a statement of the court in that opinion. I quote:

Hence it seems to be eminently proper that where the legislative power exists some statutory provision should be made for binding the minority in a reasonable way by the will of the majority; and unless, as is the case in the States of the United States, the passage of laws impairing the obligation of contracts is forbidden, we see no good reason why such provision may not be made in respect to existing as well as prospective obligations. The nature of securities of this class is such that the right of legislative supervision for the good of all, unless restrained by some constitutional prohibition, seems almost necessarily to form one of their ingredients, and when insolvency is threatened, and the interests of the public, as well as creditors, are imperiled by the financial embarrassments of the corporation, a reasonable "scheme of arrangement" may, in our opinion, as well as legalized as an ordinary "composition in bankruptcy." In fact, such "arrangement acts" are a species of bankrupt acts.

It is in entire harmony with the spirit of bankrupt laws, the binding force of which, upon those who are subject to the jurisdiction is recognized by all civilized nations. It is not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, which, although prohibiting States from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts, allows Congress "to establish * * * uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States."

* * * * * * *

The confirmation and legalization of "a scheme of arrangement" under such circumstances is no more than is done in bankruptcy when a "composition" agreement with the bankrupt debtor, if assented to by the required majority of creditors, is made binding on the nonassessing minority. In no just sense do such governmental regulations deprive a person of his property without due process of law—

And so forth.

It is clear from that opinion that arrangements contemplated in this measure come within the legal definition of the term "bankrupt", and are, therefore, within the power of Congress to pass uniform laws concerning the subject of bankruptcy.

There has been presented an opinion from someone in the Department of Justice to the effect, as I understand, that the bill is valid insofar as cities and counties are concerned, but not valid as to drainage, irrigation, levee districts, and other taxing units of a similar character on the theory that the latter class are departments of the State government.

In my judgment, there is not the slightest foundation for the discrimination which has been made in the opinion referred to. A city is certainly as much a part of the State government as a school district or a drainage district or a levee district. As a matter of fact, the courts have made no such distinction. There are hundreds, perhaps, thousands of cases that have been decided by the Federal courts involved bond issues of counties, townships, school districts, irrigation districts, drainage districts, levee districts and other types of taxing units, and the attempted distinction between municipalities and cities, towns and villages, and quasi-public corporations, such as counties, townships, school districts, drainage, irrigation, and levee districts is, therefore, clearly, to my mind, unsound.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. If the opinion to which the Senator refers is sound, then the districts mentioned need no legislation to enable them to go into the bankruptcy court. The distinction which is sought to be made is that the taxing districts and municipalities have a governmental capacity and also a business capacity of a private nature. That has been recognized by all the authorities. The maintaining of waterworks, for instance, is not a necessary governmental function by a city. In those cases where the functions performed are not necessarily governmental functions, if it be desired to classify them as private business, then there is no law needed to enable them to go into bankruptcy. But I agree fully with the Senator that there are no decisions of which I know that would justify the opinion which I heard mentioned by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] yesterday in his argument.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And that is the opinion to which the Senator from Arkansas is now referring. There is absolutely no important distinction under the Constitution properly to be made, in my judgment, between that class of public corporations which the opinion held as coming within the power of Congress to enact bankruptcy laws and that other class which was held not to come within the same authority.

Mr. LOGAN. The fact is that none of them can exist without the authority of the State in some way.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is entirely true.

Mr. LOGAN. And one is just as much an arm of the State government as is the other.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is exactly true, in my judgment.

So I pass now from that phase of the subject to a conclusion with respect to the proposed legislation.

This bill is safeguarded, particularly as proposed by the so-called "McCarran amendment", to a degree that will make exceedingly difficult in some instances the application of the relief, but, at the same time, it is recognized that public corporations ought not to find it easy to enter into a process for the adjustment of their obligations. The McCarran amendment recognizes in a greater degree than does the original bill the necessity for imposing restrictions and safeguards.

Now I desire to call to the attention of the Senate just what must happen in order that one of these taxing units may have the benefit of the arrangement contemplated by the pending bill.

In the first place, the holders of 51 percent of the obligations of the district must concur with the district in a plan. When that has been done, the matter may be brought before the court. Before the plan can be confirmed the holders of 66⅔ percent of each class of obligations owed by the taxing unit must concur in the plan and the holders of 75 percent of the aggregate of the obligations must agree to the plan. That means that when a district is unable to meet its obligations, when certain facts required by the proposed statute to be found by the court shall have been ascertained, the holders of 75 percent of the obligations of the taxing unit may impose on the remaining 25 percent the necessity of abiding the decision of the court and of the 75 percent.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. Is there any difference in that principle and the principle that governs in the consolidation of corporations and the sale of corporate property by corporations? Nearly all the States have found it necessary, in order to protect a majority against an obstreperous minority, to provide that the minority must be bound by the action of a majority, and usually it has been fixed at 75 percent. The action is binding on all of them if 75 percent of the stockholders or bondholders agree to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is no difference in morals; of course, there are legal differences, which the Senator readily can see.

If any adjustment is to be worked out, if any relief is to be afforded to the people residing in the territory covered by these various public corporations, this plan admittedly is a fair one. It is very carefully safeguarded. What must the court find before the plan is approved? I quote now from the so-called "McCarran amendment":

After hearing such objections as may be made to the plan, the judge shall confirm the plan if satisfied that (1)—

Now, listen to this—

it is fair, equitable, and for the best interests of the creditors, and does not discriminate unfairly in favor of any class of creditors.

That is the first requirement that must be determined by the court in passing upon the plan presented and approved, as I have already indicated. It must be "fair, equitable, and for the best interests of the creditors", and it must not "discriminate unfairly in favor of any class of creditors."

(2) Complies with the provisions of subdivision (b) of this chapter.

And subdivision (b) is "a plan of readjustment within the meaning of the chapter" and—

Shall include provisions modifying or altering the rights of creditors generally, or of any class of them secured or unsecured, either through the issuance of new securities of any character or otherwise; and (2) may contain such other provisions and agreements, not inconsistent with this chapter, as the parties now desire.

It is lengthy, and I will not read all of subdivision (b).

(3) Has been accepted and approved as required by the provisions of subdivision (d) of this chapter.

That is, by 66⅔ of each class of every class of claims and by 75 percent of the claims in the aggregate.

(4) All amounts to be paid by the taxing district for services or expenses incident to the readjustment have been fully disclosed and are reasonable.

It even safeguards against excessive expenses and against waste of the funds of the bankrupt.

(5) The offer of the plan and its acceptance are in good faith; and (6) the taxing district is authorized by law, upon confirmation of the plan, to take all action necessary to carry out the plan. Before a plan is confirmed, changes and modifications may be made therein, with the approval of the judge after hearing upon notice to creditors, subject to the right of any creditor who shall previously have accepted the plan to withdraw his acceptance, within a period to be fixed by the judge and after such notice as the judge may direct, if, in the opinion of the judge, the change or modification will be materially adverse to the interest of such creditor, and if any creditor having such right of withdrawal shall not withdraw within such period, he shall be deemed to have accepted the plan as changed or modified: Provided, however, That the plan as changed or modified shall comply with all the provisions of this subdivision.

I have taken the pains to cite these provisions in order to show, since some method of adjustment is necessary on account of the circumstances which are described earlier in my remarks, and since this is the only plan presented, that this plan is amply and carefully safeguarded in the interest of the creditors. The rights of the municipality, or of the taxing unit, of course, are preserved, because the entire proceeding must be initiated and be carried forward with its approval.

I thank the Senate for the very attentive manner in which it has heard me.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, may I inquire if the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida has been adopted?

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood the amendment was adopted.

Mr. NEELY. May I inquire whether the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has been adopted?

Mr. JOHNSON. No, Mr. President. I have merely a formal amendment, which I should like to have adopted. I send it to the desk and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 7, it is proposed to strike out the period following the word "located" and to insert the following:

And for any such district having no officials of its own, the petition shall be filed by the municipality or political subdivision, the officials of which have power to contract on behalf of said district or to levy the special assessments within such district.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, that amendment is satisfactory to those who have the bill in charge, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is not a question of the adoption of the amendment. The Senator has a right to ask that it be substituted for his own proposal. The adoption must come, of course, upon the vote of the Senate.

Mr. NEELY. I merely asked that the Johnson amendment be adopted to the proposed substitute amendment.

Mr. McNARY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the amendment is to the original bill, and, if the proposed substitute is to be adopted, I will have to insert it in the substitute as well.

Mr. NEELY. I thought the Senator from California was offering the amendment to the proposed substitute. May I suggest that he do that?

Mr. JOHNSON. I can do that. All that will be essential is to change the reference to the particular place where it should appear. The wording is the same; but in the proposed substitute it should be inserted after the word "located", in line 6, page 3. I offer the amendment to the proposed substitute and ask for its adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California offers an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], as amended, in the nature of a substitute. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment on page 3, line 6, by striking out the period following the word "located", and adding the following:

and for any such district having no officials of its own the petition shall be filed by the municipality or political subdivision, the officials of which have power to contract on behalf of said district or to levy the special assessments within such district.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the action taken a moment ago in regard to the adoption of the amendment to the original bill be vacated and that the amendment now offered by the Senator from California be adopted as an amendment to the proposed substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered, and the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada, as amended, is agreed to.

Mr. NEELY. I now ask unanimous consent that the substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], as amended, may be adopted.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is hardly the right proposal. It is not a question of adoption of the substitute by unanimous consent. That must come on the final vote, upon which I shall insist upon a roll call. I understand the Senator from West Virginia wants to accept the substitute proposed by the Senator from Nevada instead of the bill as reported by himself.

Mr. NEELY. That is true.

Mr. McNARY. That is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to be allowed to accept the pending substitute of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], as amended, in lieu of the original text reported by himself in behalf of the committee. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I reannounce the absence of certain Senators for the reasons heretofore set forth, and ask that the announcement apply to the present roll call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill as amended was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CUTTING (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when his name was called). I have a general pair for the day with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], who is unavoidably absent. I am not informed how he would vote on this question, and I, therefore, withhold my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], which I transfer to the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his named was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island, but as he would vote in the same way that I shall vote, I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WALCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], who is necessarily absent on account of illness. I transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who is necessarily absent from the Senate. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I am informed that my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] is still existing; and, as the Senator from Rhode Island has not voted, I beg to withdraw my vote and rest upon the pair until I am released. Were I at liberty to vote I should vote as my vote has already been cast.

I desire to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has a general pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON].

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THOMPSON], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. MCNARY. The Senators from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF and Mr. HEBERT] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] are detained on official business. If present, both the Senators from Rhode Island, the Senator from Iowa, and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] would vote "nay."

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] have been necessarily called out of the city. The pairs of all these Senators have been announced.

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 28, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. NEELY. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment to the bill, request a conference with the House of Representatives thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. NEELY, Mr. MCCARRAN, and Mr. AUSTIN conferees on the part of the Senate.

CORPORATE REORGANIZATIONS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5884, to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy", and so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 5884) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, as the representative of a sovereign State, the continued existence of which is dependent upon the success of its industries, I must protest against the placing of plenary tariff power in the hands of any one man or any one group. West Virginia is dependent for its success on the maintenance in America of conditions which will make possible the use of the products of the industries and mineral resources of the State.

The utterances before the Finance Committee of Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, Secretary of State Hull, and other representatives of the administration, coupled with the contents of the report of the Tariff Commission to the Senate in response to Senate Resolution 325, indicate very strongly that tariff protection is essential to the continued success of the people of the State I have the honor in part to represent, and without such protection they would be greatly jeopardized.

Some of the officials who came into office with the present administration have continually contended that Congress should only legislate on those problems submitted by the administration, and having for their purpose our recovery from the depression.

While Congress has been scolded from time to time and told that matters of recovery must come first, we find that it is not recovery, but so-called "reform legislation" we are asked to act upon.

Indeed, there are strong indications that the reform program submitted by the administration is delaying recovery in this country to such an extent that we are falling far behind other leading countries in our efforts to recover from the world-wide, war-caused depression.

Congress, as a whole, has agreed that relief must be provided and is of first importance. Administration spokesmen direct our attention to the need for haste and the need to permit of quick action with what they term "emergency problems."

Mr. President, the question of proper tariff protection originated in the First Congress of the United States, and it has been ever present with us since that date.

The question of the tariff is sometimes connected with that of an emergency, but tariff revision downward can never be connected with either recovery or reform.

Mr. President, as a representative of a sovereign State, West Virginia, with a full realization of the deplorable conditions existing throughout our land, with millions of our people unable to secure employment, with millions of our people dependent upon public or private charity for their existence, I wish to protest against diverting the attention of Congress at this time to a question of tariff revision and other so-called "reform measures", when our utmost energies should be exerted for the relief of our people.

Instead of instilling confidence in the minds of those running industries, those employed in industries, and the farmers, who are dependent for the sale of their products upon the 50,000,000 of workers of our country, we find the administration raising the red flag of fear, and it is my purpose today to direct attention to the number of industries which will be faced with increasing turmoil should plenary powers in tariff making be granted to the President.

Mr. President, the people of West Virginia believe in constitutional government, and they have the conviction that the Constitution provides for three specific branches of the Government.

The request of the President for plenary and complete power in dealing with tariff rates and reciprocal treaties without any reference to the legislative branch of Congress justifies the criticism of those who allege that the present Government is fast degenerating into a dictatorship.

Surely it cannot be contended that any central control here in Washington can know or understand the needs of the individual man and the individual industry in all of the districts of the 48 States of the Union as well as the Senators and Representatives who are elected to represent them.

It cannot be seriously contended that any such centralization of power in Washington can render to the people of our country and all of our States the substantial justice which the Senators and Representatives from those States will demand for their people.

Before dwelling upon the fallacious attitude set forth in the proposed reciprocal tariff treaty measure, let us consider the whole picture.

First. The entire basis of the argument of its proponents for this measure is a false premise. Great stress is laid on the reduction of our exports from five billions of dollars in 1929 to $1,600,000,000 in 1932. However, the proponents of the legislation proposed are not fair enough to admit that 50 percent of this loss in foreign trade is due to the loss in the price obtained in 1932 as compared with that of 1929.

I ask that there be incorporated as a part of my remarks at this point a statement showing the value of the dollar as it applies in the purchase of these commodities over these different periods, to support the contention I make respecting the value of these products, comparing the values of one period with those of another.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, in the United States there are 125,000,000 people, speaking the same language, enjoying a standard of civilization probably higher than that of the inhabitants of almost any other country on earth, and enjoying a higher standard of social welfare than that of any other nation in the world.

Here we have the wealthiest, the most complete economic machine the world has ever known.

Here we enjoy a greater opportunity for prosperity in our own markets than exists in all the rest of the world put together.

Here one half of the world's business is conducted. The entire trading world seeks to penetrate and exploit our market here, where, despite the complaint of those who criticize our supposedly high-tariff wall, two thirds of our imports are on the free list, and the average rate paid on imports into our country in 1932 was 17.9 percent as compared with 17.4 percent for free-trade England. Incidentally, England collects something near double the tariff duties that are collected by our own Government on imports from foreign countries.

There is little or no complaint in England similar to that which is heard here in the United States because of the tariff that is paid by the consumer in England as compared with the tariff paid by the consumer in the United States.

The English have learned of the advisability, yes, the Nation's profit, in providing employment for their workers.

In 1917 we gave our best in the way of promises for future manhood to further the progress of democracy among the nations of the earth.

As a nation of peace-loving people in the year of 1917 we were embroiled in the greatest conflict in the history of the world. At that time we had a nation debt of $1,225,000,000, as compared with a debt calculated in 1921 to be over $26,000,000,000. That is part of the price we paid for participating in this unnecessary conflict, which was conceived, fostered, and prosecuted for imperialism and territorial possessions.

Our national debt today is between twenty-six and twenty-seven billion dollars, with allotments and commitments amounting to $10,000,000,000 more, or a total of approximately $37,000,000,000. This will mean a yearly interest rate of well over a billion dollars. And the responsibilities to our veterans are not yet determined.

An average of more than 90 percent of all we produce is consumed in the home market by our own people, yet some would open our home market to foreign labor products, notwithstanding current history records the fact that in Europe labor is paid from one fourth to one third the wages paid to industrial workers in America, while the Asiastic wage is not greater than 0.1 of the wages paid to the workers in America.

Mr. President, there appeared in the Evening Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, on Tuesday, April 24, a very interesting communication dealing with this very subject as it applies to that empire in the Orient, Japan. I ask that it be included as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JAPANESE COMPETITION

To the EDITOR OF THE EVENING LEDGER.

SIR: Realizing your interest in behalf of industry and labor, might I bring to your attention the following?

The increasing trade of Japan with South America and the United States, the vast amount of manufactured goods she is able to export has brought out the fact that weavers in Japan earn $1.33 per week working long hours, and girls earn about 50 cents per week. In Pennsylvania, especially Philadelphia, weavers of chenille and rag rugs earn $20.50 to about $30, and many of the employees in other work make good wages; many girls earn from $15 to $28 per week.

The rag and chenille rug mills are almost at a standstill. Many industries are facing ruin and thousands of employees are facing starvation. Is it fair to ruin American industries and throw out of employment American labor?

Your interest and cooperation are asked. Some 300 mills and 25,000 employees in cotton mills are at stake.

ROBERT L. SINCLAIR.

PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, while we are standing on the brink of bankruptcy, with repudiation already indulged in, we are asked to set up a reciprocal tariff scheme to deal with bankrupt nations of Europe and of South America, as well as to enter into reciprocal relations with that well developed little nation in the Orient which is claiming our home and foreign markets; and industries here which once enjoyed these foreign and home markets may soon be confronted with the danger of elimination.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks, as proof of the statement I have just made, a statement showing the great progress Japan has made in the last few years in the development of all kinds of industries, especially the one industry which is paramount to all other industries, one we did not enjoy for a period of a hundred years, namely, the chemical industry. Japan, France, England, and Germany do not permit the importation of foreign-made chemicals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, few American citizens realize the astounding progress made by Japan as an industrial nation. Within a few years she has become not only well nigh self-contained but today is occupying a commanding position in the export markets of the world in the export of many products. The advantage of Japan as a low-cost producer, with pitiful wages compared with those of any other industrial nation, hardly needs further mention. I will take only one example.

Japan today occupies the first place among all the nations of the world as an exporter of manufactured cotton goods, formerly held by Great Britain. Quick to realize the fundamental place of the chemical industry in national welfare as a key to national defense and as a necessity in a rising position in the export markets of the world, Japan, through government aid, has a chemical industry today which is rapidly achieving a position in the export markets of the Eastern Hemisphere. Her capital investment in the chemical industry as of December 1932 is reported by the Department of Commerce to be 510,839,040 yen, with the total number of companies 1,451.

Exports are increasing of industrial chemicals, fertilizers, dyes, paints, medicinals, and a host of miscellaneous chemical products. Production is well established in the heavy chemical field in such basic products as acids, alkalis, salts, carbide; and Japan today has a large and rapidly expanding dye and synthetic organic chemical industry which ties up directly with research and production of medicinals for her peace-time requirements and export markets, as well as a large capacity for the production of high explosives and munitions.

These are facts which should be considered with deliberate care, as they typify the transformation of a backward nation to a forward looking, aggressive, industrial nation stepping out, demanding and taking over export markets. Perhaps no better example could be taken than the progress in the production of pyroxylin-celluloid and rayon. No industrial chemical nation, including Germany, can compete with Japan's pyroxylin articles. It is entirely clear that Japan will soon be one of the world's dominant factors in the export of rayon, due to her tremendous advantage in low labor costs.

It will, I believe, be of unusual interest to the Members of the Senate and the citizens of our country generally to review Special Circular 383, of the Department of Commerce of the United States, entitled "Japan's Chemical Industry in 1933", so I have asked permission to include this report on Japan's chemical industry at the conclusion of my remarks.

It seems to me both presumptuous and wholly un-American that despite the constitutional limitations on treaty making the President should give serious consideration to entering into treaties with foreign nations, which treaties can only mean further suffering and privation for our millions of farmers and industrial workers. I venture this conclusion largely upon a report of the Tariff Commission in response to Senate Resolution 325.

We are asked to place a large part of the taxing power in the hands of some unknown agency to be designated by the President.

We are asked further to surrender to foreign nations, as the State Department has already surrendered to Colombia, the right of the Congress of the United States to levy import duties on certain commodities.

We are asked, as representatives of sovereign States, to delegate to an unknown group the power of life and death over the employment opportunities and continued welfare of American labor, American agriculture, and American industry.

It is only in recent months that the question has been raised of inefficient industries. We heard that discussed in the contest on the floor of the Senate over rates in the tariff bill which became a law in 1930, but only in a brief way, without any support being given to the statements made by those who preferred lower rates to the rates finally adopted by a majority of this body. Members of the House Ways and Means Committee, and members of the Senate Finance Committee, I understand, have appealed in vain for some definition of what industries might be characterized as inefficient.

Mr. President, at last, from the administrative spokesman of agriculture, we have received a definition of that which, in his opinion—and I assume he reflects the opinion of the administration—that formula by which we can ascertain those American industries, which, in the opinion of the "brain trust" are inefficient and marked for slaughter.

It is my understanding, Mr. President, that Secretary Wallace contends that a tariff of 100 percent of itself suggests, according to his definition of ability to meet foreign competition, that an industry needing such protection is inefficient.

Further, I understand that Secretary Wallace contends that the tariff on any commodity which is on an export basis—that is, those products of which we export more than we import—is but a paper tariff and is of no consequential benefit to the American industry so protected.

I presume it will interest some Members of the Senate to read a compilation of those industries which, according to the formula of Secretary Wallace, are inefficient or protected by paper tariffs.

Of course, with such a reasoning in control, the present tariff rates on those commodities will be reduced the full 50 percent if the authority sought by the President in the pending measure is granted by this body.

Mr. President, there are possibly three commodities of the many produced in our country which can meet world competition without any tariff.

One is cotton, the exports of which were 25 percent greater in 1932 than they were in 1929.

Automobiles constitute another. We export only 5 percent of our total production but are able to meet world competition, due to mass production, which is made possible by the purchasing power of our own people, who ordinarily purchase 95 percent of the automobiles manufactured.

Third, heavy machinery and office supplies, such as typewriters, addressing machines, and so forth. The ability to meet foreign competition is due principally to the fact that some 90 percent or more of such products are sold in the American market and, through tremendous demand on the part of our own people, the mass production of such articles alone makes possible their competition in world markets.

The basic commodity, that commodity and the producers of which the Congress is allegedly seeking to benefit through the granting of this extraordinary power to the President, is dependent for some 95 percent of its income, other than cotton, on the purchasing power of the industrial workers of our country.

Were the President permitted by the Senate, and were he able to negotiate reciprocal trade treaties with foreign nations so that the products of American soil, American mines, and American factories could meet world competition without present tariff protection, that could only be done through the reduction of the standard of living ordinarily enjoyed by Americans to those standards so prevalent in Europe, Asia, and South America.

Is it possible that those who are advising the President, and who contend that they wish to help American farmers, are ignorant of the developments of American chemistry?

Surely, college professors and economists who lecture on the knowledge contained in scientific books are conversant with the fact that modern chemistry is now able to take whale oil, or coconuts and other tropical products, and deliver to the American consumers the same nutritive value, the same body builders, the same blood builders as are obtained from the milk, cream, butter, and cheese which are now produced by American dairies, and do so at less than 5 percent of the cost of production of the food products by the American dairies.

At a future date I shall undertake to discuss in great detail the important developments of chemical progress as they apply to the cotton farmers, which will demonstrate completely that if we revolutionize our industrial fabric it must be done in the interest of the American producer and American consumer, and not having uppermost in mind those who live in other parts of the world, where food products, due to favorable natural environments, are largely developed and ripened with little mental or physical effort on the part of those who garner these products and ship them into competition in our home market with American products, where real labor and toil must be exerted from sun-up to sun-down on the American farm.

The present situation suggests a development which may not be unlike the case of the production of indigo. In former days indigo, a vegetable product, utilized thousands and thousands of acres of land to take care of the demands of the consumer, whereas now the synthetic product has eliminated the need for the natural cultivation of indigo.

Indeed, it is not unlike another case wherein thousands of acres of the farmers' land were devoted to the purpose of yielding a sufficient amount of madder dye to meet the demands of the consumer, but now synthetic dyes can and have been developed through the unfolding and unravelling of chemical equations. The same can be said of the development recently projected by a distinguished chemist by which slash pine, through certain chemical treatments resulting in the formation of cellulose, can be transformed into newsprint, writing paper, and other basic and byproducts that are furnished by the cotton farmer. Synthetic chemical products will soon be a formidable competitor of the American farmer unless the production of chemical products shall be adjusted along with the development of the production of food products in such manner that chemical, industrial, and farm production will go hand in hand in the future.

I merely refer to these facts in passing, as it is my purpose to deal more fully with them at a later date. It is my purpose, Mr. President, to give attention to these new products which have been made possible by chemical revelation in industry, and of which we were deprived for a period almost as old as the Nation itself and only taken advantage of after the costly price in the way of experience we paid during the great World War due to this lack of chemical development.

My purpose today is to review the Tariff Commission's report and point out the fallacy and the pitfalls which must necessarily come if the purpose of the reciprocal tariff trading experiment is carried out.

The Senate resolution and the response made by the Tariff Commission can be taken, in my judgment, Mr. President, as an indication of the basis upon which readjustment of tariff rates will come, and in every instance, Mr. President, it will mean a reduction in the way of tariff protection to the industries wherever they are found in any section of this country.

It seems to me that most any fairly well-trained mind could write in advance the obituary of this experimentation. It is only one among others which are admitted by the administration to be experimental.

The administration is responsible for the regimentation of the individual man, as well as the industries of this land, and the ultimate effect that this reciprocal tariff effort will have on American labor and industry, as a result of the power which Congress proposes to grant to the experimenters of this administration, can only be harmful. When this transfer is completed the entire destiny of the American people will be in their control, directly in contradiction to every principle which has made this Nation great.

It is for these reasons, Mr. President, I propose to review the report of the Tariff Commission given in response to Senate Resolution 325, so that the American people may know the story, for I am deeply concerned with the welfare of everyone in the 48 States of the Union, and especially with the 1,750,000 people of West Virginia, the State I have the honor to represent in part here in the Senate.

This action is not one that was thought out for the purpose of helping to promote the success of American labor, agriculture, or industry. This action is predicated upon a resolution presented to the Senate of the United States by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], who prevailed upon the Senate on January 28, 1933, to direct the United States Tariff Commission and other Government bodies to make a report to the Senate relative to the imports of those dutiable articles more or less noncompetitive with domestic products and with respect to which foreign countries possess advantages, dutiable articles of which the imports are less than 5 percent of domestic production, articles on which the tariff rates exceed 50 percent ad valorem, articles of which imports have substantially decreased, dutiable articles of which the imports have increased since 1929, articles produced in the United States with advantages which were factors in causing them to be exported in substantial quantities, exports which have decreased in quantity or value since 1929, and information on the extent of resulting unemployment.

Mr. President, the recommendation now before the Senate Finance Committee is but a continuation of subtle efforts made by and on behalf of those who are opposed to the policy of protection for American industries, and who, realizing the impossibility of having their wishes concurred in by a majority of Congress or a majority of the American public, resort to such devices as we will soon have before us—the reciprocal tariff bill.

It is interesting to note that some 10 reciprocal trade treaties were entered into on the part of the United States with foreign governments under the Dingley law, and none of such treaties was ever ratified by the Senate. The people of the United States, to assure themselves of the protection which was necessary to them while those treaties were under consideration, maintained a substantial Republican majority in the Senate of the United States who believed in the principles of protection and in the development of industry in America.

Mr. President, it is not my intention to deal with the constitutional phase of this subject; that I will leave in the hands of those in the Senate well versed in the law and in much better position than am I to discuss the constitutional and legal questions involved.

As farming is the basic industry upon which we are all dependent, it is advisable that we start with the articles produced on the American farm which come within the classification of "inefficient" industries.

The first article on the list, Mr. President, is cane and beet sugar.

As to the intention of the administration with respect to sugar, there is hardly any Member of the Senate who is not familiar with the policy of those in charge of the Department of Agriculture, which is the elimination of the production of cane and beet sugar in the United States.

The expert for the Department of Agriculture, no less a person than the Secretary of Agriculture himself, has publicly stated that the production of sugar in the United States should be abandoned and has advised that we become dependent upon Cuba and other countries for our sugar.

How different that position, Mr. President, from the position taken by Germany and by practically every European nation that is determined to be self-sufficient, self-furnishing to their own people, so that in any critical period that may come to them they will not have to depend upon some other country for support.

Incidentally, it might be mentioned at this time that Wall Street bankers have invested many million dollars in Cuban sugar plantations not for the benefit of the American people but solely for the enrichment of themselves. Naturally, if we are to become dependent upon Cuba for the sugar which we must necessarily consume, we will insure substantial profits, to say the least, to the Wall Street bankers who have a way of getting such legislative results as they find are helpful to their financial interests. I do not have any fault to find with the banker as such, but I do have fault to find, and a very grevious one, when any group takes the position that we should not be self-sufficient or, at least, in a position to protect ourselves against prices increased beyond reason which we may be forced to pay for some basic commodity essential to the welfare of every American home.

In substance the comment of the Tariff Commission in its findings on sugar are—and I quote—as follows:

> Cuba has special advantages in the production of cane sugar by reason of her soil and climate. The climate permits a long-growing season, and the soil yields more crops from one planting than are obtained in the cane-sugar area of continental United States. Furthermore, there is sufficiently large amount of land available in Cuba so that an extensive form of cultivation is possible.

The Tariff Commission might have added that the labor costs in Cuba are very small and, despite conditions sometimes referred to as harmful in America, there is no restriction in Cuba against child labor or any other near-slave labor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, do I understand the quotation the Senator has just cited is from the Tariff Commission or from the National City Bank?

Mr. HATFIELD. It might have been from the National City Bank, but in reality it comes from the Tariff Commission. Where the Tariff Commission procured this information, the Senator is in about the same position, from the standpoint of analogy to determine, as am I, if we are to believe the statements of Mr. O'Brien, Chairman of the Tariff Commission, regarding the careless way the Commission deals with the confidence of the Senate.

The next item I find is leaf tobacco for cigar wrappers. I note the comment of the Tariff Commission, which, in part, is as follows:

> Since 1880 Sumatra and Java have been the world's principal source of high-grade cigar wrapper, being favored by possession of rich soil and tropical climate adapted to growing leaf of requisite color, burn, flavor, texture, and size. Abundance of cheap labor, Javanese and Chinese, is important because of necessity of heavy expenditures of hand labor in growing and grading leaf. Large Dutch companies have combined to introduce economies of large-scale operation, to standardize grades, and to enforce monopolistic policies. Imports are supplementary to most of the domestic cigar tobacco but competitive with domestic wrapper leaf grown at high cost under artificial shade in Connecticut Valley and Georgia-Florida area.

I direct the Senate's attention to the fact, Mr. President, that reference is made in many comments on the part of the Tariff Commission to the existence in foreign countries of cheap labor.

It is my understanding that the Chinese and Javanese labor used in the production of Sumatra tobacco is indentured labor. The Tariff Commission's findings indicate that the Sumatra wrapper is the product of the Dutch monopoly. Yet this monopolistic product is to be favored by the administration. Such action would be in harmony with the present trend of the administration in encouraging big-business monopolies by the suspension of the Sherman antitrust laws.

Leaf tobacco for cigarettes: The Tariff Commission's comment, in part, reads as follows:

> Soil and climatic conditions in Near East countries especially adapted to production of small-leaved aromatic types imported. Harvesting by picking individual leaves requires large expenditure of hand labor.

Mr. President, this subject was thoroughly discussed and threshed out during the consideration of the tariff bill in this Hall in 1930, when a majority of this body dealt with these imports in a way that protected, at least in part, the opportunities of the American farmer in the production of American tobacco.

The Tariff Commission might well have added that hand labor in the Near East is cheaper than any labor available to the American farmer in this country.

The next item is eggs in the shell, whole egg yolks, and egg albumen, dried. The Tariff Commission indicates that China supplies 94 percent of the eggs imported and practically the entire domestic consumption of whole egg yolks and egg albumen, dried.

Mr. President, is it any wonder that the dairy interest of this country, large producers of eggs, find themselves in an embarrassing position when they are forced to compete with the products of the Chinese farmers?

The next item on the list is fish, dried and unsalted, and I note that the principal source of imports is Japan.

I want to read a telegram from the Westgate Sea Products Co. It is dated February 3, 1933, addressed to me, and is as follows:

> During 1932 Japan exported to United States approximately 200,000 cases canned tuna, an increase of 558 percent. Information on hand shows Japan has potential supply to pack far more tuna than is consumed in United States and plans to more than double exports to this country during present year. Japan used very little canned tuna. Practically their entire market is this country. California fishing industry has about $50,000,000 invested, employing 25,000.

Mr. President, complaints came from the great State of Washington, from California, and other western-coast States in 1932 and 1933; indeed, representatives from those States came to the Congress of the United States and appealed to the Congress for relief, but no relief was afforded.

Another item I note is oil cake and oil-cake meal, and the principal source of imports is China. The comment of the Tariff Commission, in part, is as follows:

> Soil, climatic, and labor conditions have so favored production of soybeans in Manchuria that the world's most important soybean industry has been established there. Crushers have available the cheapest supply of beans and are favored by low ocean freight to our west coast, which is a deficiency area for protein feeds.

The report of the Tariff Commission indicates that the American farmers are substantial producers of soybeans, but, naturally, they cannot get a fair price for their product when they are forced to compete with the cheap labor conditions of China.

The next item is orange and lemon peel, of which Florida and California produce substantially the same material. The comment of the Tariff Commission is, in part, as follows:

> Italy has an advantage not only of an established industry but an adequate supply of hand labor for the preparation and grading.

They did not add, as they might have, that this adequate supply of hand labor is also cheap labor.

Another item is tomatoes, a product produced on the farms of America in almost every State, and chiefly in Florida, Texas, and West Virginia.

The next item is long-staple cotton, a commodity which the Republican Party succeeded in placing upon the dutiable list, at the instance and suggestion of the distinguished Senator from the great State of Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], with a duty which it was hoped would make it possible for the cotton planters of Mississippi, Texas, Arizona, and California, to produce at a profit in competition with the cheap cost of production of Egypt and the Sudan, where sufficient long-staple cotton can be produced to supply all the demands of every nook and corner of the world.

The Tariff Commission's comment on long-staple cotton, in part, is as follows:

Egypt and Sudan can supply the present world demand for this staple length. The relatively less expensive hand labor in Egypt also makes possible more careful ginning, mixing, and baling.

Another item worth mentioning and of special interest to New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and some other States, is common brick. During the period 1926 to 1928 the domestic industry, especially in New York and the New England States, were suffering from the importation of the cheap-labor-produced bricks of Belgium, which were landed along the Atlantic seaboard at prices which were less than American costs of production. Of course, it can well be said that Belgium, in this case, and other countries and China in other cases, possess an advantage, in that they have cheap hand labor and low freight rates.

Another item of interest to the people of Alabama is that of graphite, or plumbago, the imports of which come principally from Madagascar. The comment of the Tariff Commission on this article may be of some interest to Members of the Senate, not alone as it affects graphite but as it may affect interests which are consequential in their home States. The comment, in part, is as follows:

Nineteen hundred and twenty-nine imports were the greatest since 1923. The Alabama producers of flake make strong efforts to compete with Madagascar, and there are indications that the use of the oil-flotation process of concentration may strengthen their efforts. Transportation costs from Alabama to the large New York market are nearly twice the freight charges from Madagascar.

The next item is that of prisms and glass chandeliers, a commodity of interest to the people of my State, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois. The comment of the Tariff Commission, in part, is indicative of why foreign producers of these articles control our market. I quote:

Production requires considerable amount of hand labor. Foreign producers have the advantage of a long-established industry, articles for the most part being produced by workers in their homes.

The next item is illuminating glassware, the imports of which come principally from Czechoslovakia and Germany. The comment of the Tariff Commission on this commodity is similar to that on prisms and glass chandeliers.

May I digress to remark that the glass industry of West Virginia is among the greatest industries we have there. Fifty percent of all the window glass produced in America is produced within the confines of the State of West Virginia. Many other glass industries of very great importance can only hope to continue in a profitable way and pay a standard of wage which is worthy of the hire of toilers in those industries by being protected against the cheap products that are shipped into this country from Europe and Asia.

The next item I note is that of marble, the imports of which come principally from Italy and Belgium. I have reason to believe that there is an abundance of marble in our own country; but, due to the fact that the producers of this marble pay labor a comparatively high wage, when the competition they must face is considered, the comment of the Tariff Commission on marble might be of interest to those who seek the development of foreign industries at the expense of American industry, farming, and labor. The comment, in part, is as follows:

The Italian industry has available an abundance of experienced quarry labor at relatively low wages.

Manganese ore, a product of interest to many Senators, is also on the list of industries to be sacrificed. The comment of the Tariff Commission is, in part, as follows:

Deposits in Russia, India, Brazil, and on the Gold Coast of Africa are far richer and more extensive than those in the United States. Any of the first three named countries could probably supply the world's needs.

Mr. President, in case of a need of manganese for national defense, would there be an opportunity for us to secure manganese from either Russia, India, or Brazil? The Tariff Commission failed to comment on the fact that the principal reason for the lack of production of manganese in the United States is the fact that the labor costs in Russia, India, and Brazil are so much lower than similar labor costs in America that American mines for the most part have had to shut down.

Another essential metal is that of tungsten ore and concentrates, and I note the Tariff Commission comment is that—

Deposits in China are of much higher grade than in the United States. Bolivia and Burma are minor sources of high-grade ore.

I do not quite fathom why the Tariff Commission, in fairness to itself and to the Senate, fails in this case, as in so many others, to note that the real advantage possessed in the Asiatic countries over labor costs of our own country is that the wages paid to the labor of the Orient would not be tolerated by labor in our own country.

The next item is that of woven wire cloth, and the comment of the Tariff Commission, of interest to those dependent upon this industry in our own country, is in part as follows:

Fineness and extreme uniformity of mesh require weaving the finer meshes on hand looms, giving European producers an advantage on account of high proportion of labor used and availability of small-shop methods.

Another item is that of watch movements and watch parts. The comment of the Tariff Commission is in part as follows:

Watchmaking is an important traditional industry in Switzerland, with abundant skilled labor, flexible, organized in small units, and supplying a world market with nearly all varieties of watches.

Such comment may be of interest to those representing the watch industry of New England, Illinois, and other States.

Mr. President, the Congress of the United States for years has sought to find a way to help the cotton planter. One way in which we can help the cotton planter is to make use of cotton in American mills. Another way to help both labor and cotton is to pay the American cotton farmer a bounty, so that we would have cheap textiles on the markets of this country that could be enjoyed by the group of our citizens who cannot well afford to buy them at present. Especially is this true at the present time, and especially does it apply to the hospitals of this land, which are on the brink of bankruptcy. The high prices of cotton and gauze and other cotton products essential to the administration of these institutions makes it almost prohibitive for them to take care of the demands of the unfortunate people who are brought to them daily for relief.

One of the items worth while mentioning in this list of industries is that of cotton-warp-knit fabric gloves. The Tariff Commission comment is as follows:

A Tariff Commission investigation in 1923 showed duty of about 122 percent ad valorem necessary to equalize costs.

Of course, that industry would go out without any discussion, according to Mr. Wallace's theory, were he in control of the administration of the tariff as it applies to this industry.

The Tariff Commission continues:

The long-established German industry has the advantage of cheap labor, highly skilled in the technique of knitting and finishing such gloves. The best grades of domestic circular-knit gloves are comparable with the lowest grade of imported warp-knit fabric gloves.

It might be noted in this comment of the Tariff Commission that Germany has the advantage of cheap labor.

Mr. President, among the commodities added by the Senate amendments to the list of basic commodities under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, were flax and hemp. It is to be assumed that flax and hemp are produced in sufficient quantities in our own country to warrant some assistance being given domestic producers, or we would not have voted them basic crops.

The comment of the Tariff Commission may be of interest to Senators representing flax- and hemp-growing districts:

This type of crop does not appeal to the American farmer. It has not been produced in the United States in appreciable quantities, and domestic production is, furthermore, not comparable as to quality with imported fiber.

The Tariff Commission's comment on hemp is of interest:

Domestic production of hemp fiber in recent years has not been substantial in relation to imports, and had almost entirely disappeared in 1932.

Mr. President, for a number of years Senators, representing especially the Western States, and those sincerely interested in the development of American industry, have sought to help by legislation, where possible, the American wool grower. The comment of the Tariff Commission on carpet wool, camel's hair, and other wool not finer than 40s is interesting. I quote:

The competition with domestic wool is, therefore, in part indirect. Imports of all other wools, not finer than 40s, compete directly with domestic wools of like grade. Dutiable camel's hair competes directly with cashmere, alpaca, vicuna, and similar hair. Being used in specialty fabrics, the competition between camel's hair and domestic wool is in part indirect.

If this bill becomes a law we shall be buying imported instead of home products.

Another item I note is that of toy games, and so forth, imported principally from Germany and Japan; and the Tariff Commission comment indicates the interest which the Tariff Commission experts may have in developing employment opportunities for American labor. I quote:

Hand labor, required for making these toy games, etc., is readily available in Germany and Japan.

An item of interest to some Senators is the manufacture of lace. The comment of the Tariff Commission, in part, is:

Chinese laces are made with cheap labor, and are competitive with some of the products of the American machine-made lace industry.

Further on, the Tariff Commission's comment reads:

The principal foreign advantages are the length of time the industry has been established and the available highly skilled workers.

Mr. President, if we were to proceed upon this principle in the development of our industry as it pertains to the lace manufacturer, we would never be self-sufficient.

Mr. President, many Members of the Senate are especially interested in the maintenance of a market in America for hides and skins of American cattle. Apparently this industry also is marked for slaughter. The beef-packing trusts will not suffer, as it is my understanding that the hides and skins now imported from Argentina and Brazil are the property of the Chicago beef-packing industry. The comment of the Tariff Commission on hides and skins may be of interest to some Members of the Senate. I quote:

Cattle hides and calf and kip skins are byproducts of the meat-packing industry. Domestic slaughter is not sufficient to supply the demands in grades and qualities required by domestic tanners. Heavy leather tanners are dependent on Argentina for "Frigorifico" hides, which are similar to domestic packer native steer hides. Argentina has a large meat-packing industry, with a surplus of high-quality hides which is more than sufficient to supply the tanners in that country.

The items I have just referred to are those listed by the Tariff Commission as no. 9 in their report to the Senate on Senate Resolution 325, and found in Senate Document No. 180 of the second session of the Seventy-second Congress.

Mr. President, list no. 2 of the report to which I have just referred comprises a list of articles of which imports represent less than 5 percent of domestic production.

The contention of our free-trade friends during the consideration of the present tariff law was that those commodities of which we import less than 5 percent of the domestic production should be left on the free list. Assuming this to be true, I am going to show that if the power and authority sought by the Chief Executive in the pending reciprocal trade treaty bill is granted, such commodities as I shall now refer to will be among those sacrificed in favor of some other and more-favored articles or commodities.

The first item I find on this list of agricultural products and provisions is that of live cattle. Upon presentation of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] in an effort to help the live-cattle producers of America, the Congress has voted to make live cattle a basic commodity, and grant to them certain privileges and financial benefits in order that the live-cattle producers of this country might have an opportunity to continue to prosper. Yet, Mr. President, the policy of the administration, as set forth in the resolution presented by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], would warrant the belief that this industry is to be sacrificed without a hearing, and without the Senator from Texas and others representing States dependent upon the live-cattle industry having an opportunity to protest, as the importations of live cattle represent less than 1 percent of domestic production.

Mr. President, other items which I note in this list are those of tallow, oleo oil, and stearin. In each case the imports of tallow and oleo oil are listed by the Tariff Commission as less than 1 percent, while the imports of oleo stearin are listed at 4 percent.

Incidentally, Mr. President, our exports of oleo oil and oleo stearin are many times more than the value or volume of our imports. Yet in an honest effort to assist the American farmer, especially the dairy interest, the House voted an excise tax of 5 cents per pound on these commodities, and the Senate voted an excise tax of 3 cents per pound on them. Are we to suppose that the action of the Congress in voting these excise taxes is an idle gesture, or is it really intended to benefit the American farmer?

The principal sources of importations of tallow, oleo oil, and oleo stearin are Canada and Argentina. Is it to be expected, if the authority sought is granted, that in the reciprocal tariff treaties which will be made with those countries Canada or Argentina will agree to enter into reciprocal trade relations with a continuation not only of the excise tax of either 3 cents or 5 cents per pound, but also the present duties, ranging from 10 percent to 22 percent?

Mr. President, another item of interest to almost every Member of the Senate interested in developing and maintaining American industries and the prosperity of the American farmer and industrial worker is that of lard and lard substitutes. Under the present Tariff Act, the equivalent ad valorem on lard and lard substitutes runs from 11 percent to 46 percent, according to the report of the Tariff Commission. Our imports of lard and lard substitutes are inconsequential. Our exports of lard are in the hundreds of millions. Yet, Mr. President, if the producers of edible and inedible oils are to receive the protection which the Congress of the United States has voted to them, it is essential that we maintain a duty on lard and lard substitutes.

Mr. President, if there is to be any established policy or principle laid down to carry out the authority which the Chief Executive seeks in the reciprocal tariff measure now pending, the duties now imposed on imports of lard and lard substitutes would necessarily be reduced the full 50 percent.

Another item of considerable interest to the Senators of the New England States, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin, is that of whole milk and cream. The comment of the Tariff Commission on both these articles is rather similar, and I quote it in part, as follows:

The domestic production estimated in the table is for the New England States, New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey for all uses. The domestic production of whole milk for the entire United States was over 11,000,000,000 gallons in both 1929 and 1931. Imports increased until 1926, when they reached 7,386,000 gallons. Rate of duty changed from 2½ cents to 3¾ cents per gallon by presidential proclamation effective June 13, 1929.

Incidentally, the ratio of cream imports to total domestic production is less than 1 percent. The principal source of imports is Canada. I might suggest to the Senators of the New England States, and of New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin, that the dairy interests of their States, dependent for a market, as they are upon the employment of industrial workers, would find competition from Canada a factor which would soon impoverish many of the residents of those States.

Another dairy product which concerns the dairy interests, especially of the States I have mentioned, as well as of the States on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, is butter.

According to the Tariff Commission report for 1932, the equivalent ad valorem duty on imports, which come principally from New Zealand, Canada, and Denmark, was 66 percent. The importations of butter are less than 1 percent, and we export approximately the same amount. Yet, Mr. President, unless this duty of 14 cents per pound, on butter imported from New Zealand, Canada, and Denmark is maintained, many American dairy farmers will find farming a further liability, rather than an asset.

Mr. President, only a few weeks ago the Senate of the United States, upon the presentation of the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], passed a bill making barley a basic commodity, and entitling the producers of barley to the benefit of a processing tax, to be levied by the Secretary of Agriculture for their benefit. The report of the Tariff Commission indicates that our imports of barley and barley malt come principally from Canada and Czechoslovakia, and the importations represent less than 1 percent of domestic production.

Incidentally, despite the fact that barley carried an equivalent ad valorem duty for 1931 of 60 percent, the imports are listed at 187,000 bushels, while our exports for the same period amounted to 7,850,000 bushels. So I am quite sure that the senior Senator from North Dakota will be very much concerned as to what will happen to the processing tax, as well as the protection to barley, which is produced in the section of the country which he represents.

Another item of interest to many Senators is that of corn. Our principal source of imports is Argentina. Our imports for 1932, despite the equivalent ad valorem duty of 57 percent, were 185,000 bushels, while our exports are listed at 7,786,000 bushels.

It is my understanding, Mr. President, that should the duty of 25 cents a bushel be eliminated, the producers of corn in Argentina could deliver their corn into the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf Coast States at a price which would impoverish the American producers of corn, this despite the fact that the Tariff Commission states that 70 percent of the world's corn supply is grown in this country.

Another item is that of lemons. The principal source of imports is Italy. The equivalent ad valorem duty, as given by the Tariff Commission, is in excess of 92 percent. Our imports for 1932 are listed as 7,000,000 pounds, while our exports were 16,000,000 pounds. Is it to be expected that Mussolini will enter into a reciprocal tariff treaty with the United States, permitting the products of California and Florida to retain a tariff of 92 percent against importations of lemons from Italy, the importations of which now represent less than 1 percent of domestic production?

Another item, Mr. President, I note in the Tariff Commission report is that of peanuts. Peanuts are also listed, by action of the Senate, as a basic commodity, and therefore considered by a majority of the Senate to be a commodity the American producers of which are entitled to be furnished funds from the Treasury of the United States.

The importations of peanuts come principally from Asia and Spain, and for 1932 were less than 1 percent of domestic production. The imports amounted to some 627,000 pounds, while our exports were in excess of 7,000,000 pounds. The equivalent ad valorem duty on shelled peanuts, which come mostly from the Asiatics and which represent less than 1 percent of domestic production, according to the Tariff Commission report, was 246 percent.

I am wondering what Secretary Wallace will do when he comes to deal with that farm product, which is produced so generally down in the good old State of Virginia, from a tariff point of view.

Another item of interest to the farm States is that of beans. This item comes within the category of those commodities the imports of which were less than 5 percent of domestic production. The principal source of imports was Mexico; the equivalent ad valorem duty was 84 percent.

Mr. President, with the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and legalization of the sale of beer, it was to be expected that the American producers of hops would find a market for their products in America. Our imports of hops come from Czechoslovakia and Germany. Imports represent some 4 percent of domestic production and paid an equivalent ad valorem duty for 1932 of 176 percent, despite the fact that our exports for 1931 and 1932 were more than double our imports. Is it to be expected that Czechoslovakia or Germany will enter into reciprocal trade relations and permit the American producers of hops to continue to receive the protection they now receive of an equivalent ad valorem duty of 176 percent?

Fruit juices, a product of those States interested in the production of lemons, oranges, and other citrus fruits, are now protected by a duty of some 84 percent. Our importations, which come mainly from the British West Indies, amount to less than 5 percent. Are we to sacrifice the tariff protection now accorded to the fruit producers of Florida, Texas, and California?

An item of special interest to Texas, as I understand it, is that of mohair products. The Tariff Commission report for 1932 shows that with an equivalent ad valorem duty of 58 percent, our imports were less than 1 percent; and the imports come principally from Turkey and South America. I am sure that if the authority sought by the Chief Executive is granted, an effort will be made to enter into a reciprocal trade treaty with Turkey. Is it possible that mohair producers in Texas, so ably represented in past years in tariff legislation by the present Vice President of the United States, will continue to hold the protection which they now have? That which is true of mohair is also true of wool.

Mr. President, many of the Southern States now secure employment for their workers in the rayon and rayon products mills of America. Our importations of rayon represent less than 1 percent of domestic production. The imports come principally from Germany, Italy, and the Netherlands. The equivalent ad valorem duty on imports runs from 50 percent to as high as 87 percent, despite the fact that the Tariff Commission's comment on yarns of rayon is as follows:

Domestic industry leads the world; output of the United States represents over 30 percent of world's annual rayon production.

Continuing, the Tariff Commission, referred to the depression year of 1932, said:

In latter half of 1932 industry operated at capacity with record demand. Imports, due to declining prices, are dutiable mainly at minimum rate of 45 cents per pound. Composition of imports same as domestic output.

Is is expected that Germany, Italy, and the Netherlands will enter into reciprocal trade treaties with the United States, and, if so, what will happen to the employment opportunities of the workers in the rayon mills of the Southern States?

An item of interest to Senators of many States is that of straw and felt hats. The principal source of importation of straw hats is Italy, despite the equivalent ad valorem duty of more than 60 percent. The Tariff Commission states that our imports in 1931 were less than 5 percent of domestic production. Our principal source of importation of fur-felt hats is Italy, France, Belgium, and Czechoslovakia.

The Tariff Commission states that in spite of the duty of 60 percent, our imports in 1931 represented less than 2 percent of domestic production. Is it possible that we shall soon all be wearing straw and fur-felt hats produced by foreign labor?

An item of interest to Senators from many States is that of boots and shoes. Our imports come mainly from Czechoslovakia, and represent less than 3 percent of domestic production. Yet it is my understanding that this importation of less than 3 percent but a few years ago demoralized the shoe industry of this country and deprived many shoe workers of employment opportunities, as the product of their labor could not be sold at prices which competed with the product of the workers of Czechoslovakia. When we take into consideration the differential in wages paid to those men in Europe as compared with the wages paid to the toilers here in America, we can understand the condition when we know that the machinery which operates in the Czechoslovakian shoe industry is the same modern machine that operates in America, and that a thousand pairs of shoes can be ordered by some buyer of an American store one evening and in 24 hours the order is filled and on its way to America.

Mr. President, the examples which I have cited will indicate to any Senator interested in the welfare of our Nation as a whole, and in the various elements within our country, the fallacy and the dangers confronting us, if the Senate should see fit to evade its responsibilities in treaty making and turn these legislative powers over to the Chief Executive and his advisers.

Mr. President, I want to make the observation that when the Congress of the United States turns this responsibility over to the President of the United States it will take more than a majority of votes in the Congress to relieve him of the responsibility if he cares to oppose such action.

No American industry can carry out the request of Congress for the shortening of hours or the increasing of wages, or even the retention of those now employed, faced with the conditions as they would be were such legislation enacted, with the possible influx of foreign products at prices which are less than American cost-of-production.

When the distinguished Senator from Alabama presented his 6-hour day law in the Senate for the industrial workers of this country, Mr. President, I suggested to him that if he would accept an amendment which would protect the work opportunities of the American laboring man, that when goods came to our ports from Europe and from Asia that like provisions would be required in their production before they could be sold in the markets of this country, I would have no hesitancy in supporting his bill, but he declined to accept that amendment and the majority of the Senate refused to adopt it. It is only in that way, Mr. President, that hours can be reduced, wages can be increased, and the American toiler can be enabled still to enjoy employment opportunities here in America if he is brought into competition with the European and the Asiatic.

Mr. President, the passage of this bill is a repudiation of the promises made to the American people by the Chief Executive and by those in control of Congress that the expenditures of vast millions of dollars for employment of American workers would assist in eliminating the present depression.

Mr. President, the passage of this bill makes insecure the holdings of every owner of a Government bond, every life-insurance policy, and every savings-bank depositor in that it will do more to throttle the success of American industry than any other legislation up to the present conceived by the theorists and economists who seemingly are directing the destinies of our Nation at this time.

Such unrestricted power, amounting to the power of life or death for American manufacturing, mining, and farming industries, is typical of the power which those surrounding and advising the Chief Executive seek through legislation.

When this legislation is granted, Mr. President, may I ask what is left for the Congress to do? Why not pass a blanket appropriation bill for the remainder of the time that this administration is to control the destinies of the country, and permit Congress to abdicate and surrender its functions, and its Members to take up whatever vocation the individual Congressman had before he came to these bodies and relieve the taxpayers of this country of that much of a burden in the way of taxes.

The passage of this bill, it is admitted by even the administration leaders, will give to the President of the United States dictatorial power such as is not enjoyed by the Emperor of Japan, Mussolini, Hitler, or Stalin over industry and labor.

The carrying out of the measure, based as it is only upon secret diplomacy, is turning the calendar back to the methods of the dark ages. It will be turning back the calendar, Mr. President, for the Senate of the United States has refused to deal with problems pertaining to the people of this country behind closed doors.

I feel confident in saying that the vast majority of the American people are opposed to secret diplomacy and secret treaties, and if given an opportunity, would insist that international negotiations be carried on in the open.

It is admitted by the proponents of this measure that the Chief Executive, to whom they wish to give this dictatorial power, will have to depend upon advisers and subordinates to make effective the purposes of this proposed legislation. As a practical matter, from an American standpoint, no mandate has yet been given by the American people in our entire history which permitted the vesting in any one man the power sought in this bill.

The contention is raised that the President alone was elected by all the people, and this argument is set forth as to why this power should be conferred on the President. Yet those who present this argument admit that the President has not the time nor the facilities to undertake this task and must be dependent upon the activities and the influence of his advisers and subordinates.

May I ask, Is it contended that the present Chief Executive, still human, is infallible and all-wise?

Why, Mr. President, he is made of that same bone and sinew, brain and blood that the average citizen is made of, and no citizen ordinarily would want this great power left to him to direct the destinies of 125,000,000 people.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I was very much interested in the Senator's statement a moment ago with reference to secret diplomacy, to transferring treaty-making power to the President to be exercised only in secret. The Senator is aware of what I understand to be the fact, that Mr. Sayre, who is credited with having written this bill, with being its author, came before the committee and was asked what industries would be affected and what agreements would be made with foreign countries with reference to the lowering of tariffs on the assumption that it might somehow or other injure some of the industries in this country.

Mr. Sayre, Assistant Secretary of State in the present administration, at that time replied that he was not at liberty to mention the approaches that had been made to this Government by foreign governments. That he thought it was not politic to answer a question of that kind; that it probably did not concern the American people, anyhow, to know just what foreign governments were proposing in the way of trade agreements with this country. Is the Senator familiar with what transpired in the committee at that time?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Indiana states accurately the question which was propounded to the distinguished Assistant Secretary of State, and he also is correct in his conclusion about the response given by the distinguished Assistant Secretary of State.

I may say to the Senator that I called Mr. Sayre by phone and asked him if he would tell me what were the products referred to in the treaty which had been agreed to between the United States and Colombia, and he said that it was still a secret, and in my judgment it will remain a secret as to the exchanges of goods that have been agreed upon until this bill becomes a law.

I insert as a part of my remarks the letter I received from Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Sayre, and the enclosure, which speaks for itself. This treaty as signed precludes the Congress of the United States from placing any excise tax on any commodity covered by this treaty.

WASHINGTON, April 28, 1934.

The Honorable HENRY D. HATFIELD,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR HATFIELD: I am sending you herewith by special messenger, as you requested, a copy of the press release concerning the pending treaty with Colombia.

Sincerely yours,

FRANCIS B. SAYRE.

Joint statement by the Acting Secretary of State and the Minister of Colombia

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
December 15, 1933.

The Acting Secretary of State and the Minister of Colombia today signed a reciprocal trade agreement. The agreement will come into force after the necessary legislative action shall have been taken in the United States and Colombia. The minimum term of the agreement is 2 years from the date of its coming into force.

On the part of the United States the agreement provides that certain specified products of Colombia shall continue to be exempt from import duties, Federal excise taxes, and prohibitions on importation, and also that State excise taxes affecting interstate or foreign commerce, insofar as they are subject to statutory control by the Federal Government, shall not exceed the maximum tax at present levied by any State.

The agreement provides that Colombia on its part will reduce its customs duties on specified products from the United States and will refrain from increasing them on certain other specified products. As regards the products listed in the agreement Colombia makes commitments with respect to internal taxes and prohibitions similar to those made by the United States.

This agreement, which is of mutual benefit to the two countries, furnishes a practical example of the policy of "neighborliness" in the American continents, and it is hoped may lead to other bilateral agreements of a similar nature having as their object the restoration and improvement of trade relations.

Then, Mr. President, it will not be necessary for the President of the United States or for the Secretary of State or the Assistant Secretary of State to ask the Senate of the United States to approve this reciprocal treaty which has already been signed and at the present time remains the secret of the President and the Secretary of State and the Assistant Secretary of State here at Washington.

I have a response, Mr. President, from the Assistant Secretary. All the information he was willing to give a United States Senator as to the extent of the agreement or treaty, if you please, which has been entered into between Colombia and the United States, was what he gave to the press on December 15, 1933.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, then, referring again to the secrecy connected with this treaty making, it would necessarily follow, would it not, may I ask the very able Senator from West Virginia, who has studied this question very thoroughly, that no industry in this country would know if it was to be destroyed or not until it read about it in the newspapers, until it had read that it had been guillotined?

Mr. HATFIELD. That is absolutely correct. The owners of an industry can only surmise or conceive intuitively what is going to happen to that industry by some remark or some admission made either by the Secretary of State or the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture, when asked by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] as to what he considered was necessary in the way of tariffs and whether he would consider an industry which in order to exist in America necessarily had to have a 100-percent tariff rate to be an efficient industry, said "no." So the average industry owner and the average citizen of America who are interested in the continuation of the industries of American cannot know when the fatal blow will come because of a reduction of tariff rates.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That would mean that neither the Senate nor the House, either legislative body, could inquire into it until after the damage was done. It would mean, too, Mr. President—I think the Senator will agree with me—that an industry employing thousands of men and women might be destroyed merely by a secret treaty entered into by the President of the United States, resulting in the throwing out of employment of untold thousands and the destruction of the industry, and none of those interested would know anything about it until they read it had been done in the press. Is not that true?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] is entirely correct.

Mr. President, in discussing the question of the power, this supreme power, that is being asked by the present administration, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point, as a part of my remarks, a statement made by that distinguished American, that distinguished educator, that distinguished President of the United States from March 4, 1913, to March 4, 1921, the late President Wilson, in support of my contentions respecting dictatorship.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

In 1912 Woodrow Wilson said:

"The history of liberty is a history of the limitation of governmental power not the increase of it. When we resist, therefore, the concentration of power we are resisting the processes of death, because concentration of power is what always precedes the destruction of human liberties."

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, a mistake on the part of his advisers, for which the Chief Executive is, of course, responsible, may result in depriving thousands of workers of employment, just as the distinguished Senator from Indiana pointed out a few moments ago, and in depriving thousands of farmers of markets and thousands of investors of their life savings. Yet, Mr. President, should this happen, the Senate would not be blameless, as it is only through our lack of courage and our evasion of the responsibility vested in us that such mistakes can be made possible. I contend that we are justified in judging the capacity of Presidential advisers by the actions of the advisers of the present Chief Executive in other governmental affairs during the past year. We are all familiar with the air-mail fiasco, and the stubborn insistence that an impractical plan be carried on by means of one scheme after another, rather than a frank admission of error. We are all liable to error and mistake; if we were otherwise, we would not be human; but there is no question that at least 12 men, patriotic in their service and devotion to their flag, were sent to an untimely grave by this error, this mistake, which was a part of the game of politics, pure and simple, and which the record made here on the floor of the Senate by the distinguished and able senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] so well develops and so well explains.

We are all familiar with the admitted experimentation now being made in industry, labor, and agriculture. There are but few who will contend that these experiments have proven successful insofar as helping the American Nation and assisting our people to recover from the depression are concerned. The few who say this legislation has been successful are those in control of big business, who have guaranteed profits and have been permitted to exploit the consumers, our farmers and wage workers, with but little resistance on the part of the Government.

I wish to make this observation, Mr. President, that in the very near future those who have profited by the suspension of the Sherman antitrust law and who are profiting today by returns on their investments and in the sale of their products in the markets of this and other countries will soon reap the whirlwind by tax burdens which will take from them every pittance they are enjoying at the present time and even more for the purpose of furnishing the young experimenters sufficient funds to continue their exploitation.

There is nothing in the platform of the Democratic Party of 1932 nor in the interpretations of that platform on the part of its candidates for office which can be construed as a mandate from the American people to turn the American Nation over to the control of a small group of youthful theorists and economists.

There was no indication during the election of 1932 that the American people expected to find that the officers elected would permit of the Russianization of American business and the regimentation of labor and the farmer on the basis of collectivism.

I had the pleasure, Mr. President, on May 30, 1933, of pointing out the direful possibilities which would result under the National Industrial Recovery Act and later, on June 10, 1933, to my observations on this same legislation. I then expressed my views of that measure, and I have not changed my mind down to this hour. Although I have received criticism within and without my party and from the press throughout the country, I still stand firm, because the principles found in the National Industrial Recovery Act are not compatible with the principles that have made our Nation great and placed its people in such a position that they are envied by every other nation on the face of the earth because of their success not only in intellectual development but in chemical and industrial development as well.

Should the Senate of the United States debase itself by evading its responsibilities of treaty making and pass this measure, the making of reciprocal tariff treaties will be placed in the hands of the commercial policy committee which today, so I understand, consists of the following economists and college professors.

This list comprises Francis Sayre, chairman, Assistant Secretary of State; John Dickinson, Assistant Secretary of Commerce and late college professor; W. L. Thorpe, of the Department of Commerce, late a college professor and one who is looked upon by many Members of the Senate as a political opportunist in that he seeks and obtains high office in a Democratic administration even though he is listed as an active Republican worker; Rexford G. Tugwell, Under Secretary-to-be of Agriculture, whose persuasive influence at the White House is conceded by all. Tugwell was also a college professor and is the author of several books which seek to prove to the American people the benefits of communism, even though suggested in different language.

Then there are Oscar B. Ryder, of the Tariff Commission, an economist with well-known free-trade leanings; R. L. O'Brien, Chairman of the Tariff Commission, former school teacher and famous for his attempts to follow every political will-o'-the-wisp in tariff making—a veritable chameleon; and Thomas Walker Page, Vice Chairman of the Tariff Commission, for many years a college professor. Page is probably the best versed, the most intelligent, and the only one of the committee who is more interested in America, his own country, than in the success of foreign countries, but nevertheless a free-trader. Mr. Page is honest in his conclusions, honest in his convictions, regarding the principle of free trade as it should be applied to the American people. We could all understand his principles and his policy if the standards of Europe and China and Japan were brought to a parity with the standards which we demand here under the American flag.

I have no criticism to make of the character of these men. I have no criticism of the professional standing of these men, but their backgrounds are almost entirely restricted to lives of academic theory, inspiring no confidence that they can or do represent the views of American labor, the American farmer, American mining, or American business interests involved in the numerous decisions which are to be handled in secrecy.

Criticism was made on the floor of the Senate in 1929 and 1930 by the proponents of this measure opposing and restricting the flexible provisions of the present tariff act. The Republican Party, in supporting the flexible provisions of the tariff act, insisted on public hearings by the Tariff Commission and a study by experts of the Tariff Commission before such findings could be transmitted to the President for action. The President could not act until after such findings had been made by the Tariff Commission and referred to him.

The Congress in intrusting to the Tariff Commission the responsibility for making an honest investigation of the reasonableness of tariff rates had confidence in the honesty of purpose, the integrity and courage of those comprising the Commission. Had the Senate not had this confidence it would not have confirmed the men.

Personally, I still believe Senators were justified in their confidence. However, the recent utterances of the Chairman of the Commission warrant, I believe, either the Finance Committee or the Senate itself making it possible for the other members of the Tariff Commission to admit or deny the accuracy of the statements uttered by the Chairman of the Tariff Commission.

I have the honor to know at least one of the members of the Tariff Commission, the Honorable John Lee Coulter. He lived in West Virginia for a few years. We revered and esteemed him and admired his ability and his service. He served as dean of the department of agriculture of the great State university of our State. He could have become president of the university, but, because of other responsibilities which he was desirous of assuming, and, because of his ambition to travel in Europe and Asia, he declined the opportunity to become president of the State university. He has served as president of another outstanding educational institution of the country. No one can convince me that a man of that type, a man of his education and learning, would lend himself to anything that might be deemed a violation of the confidence evidenced by the Senate of the United States in confirming his nomination. I can make the same statement from the indirect knowledge I possess of him, with reference to one of the other gentlemen who has been suggested, Mr. Thomas Walker Page.

Either the Tariff Commission should continue as an honest, fearless, and independent body or it should be abolished forthwith. I do not believe that the President of the United States, either the present incumbent or the one who passed into history on March 4, 1933, would want to interfere with the duties of a Tariff Commission such as the Congress set up in the legislation of 1930. Having served as chief executive of one of the States of the Union, having the responsibility of the Governor's office and the responsibility of appointing commissions to fix rates for public-service corporations, it never occurred to me to discuss with such men their responsibility for fixing rates. To have done so would have been to ask them to violate their oath of office.

Under the proposed reciprocal tariff legislation there are to be no public hearings, no findings of fact by any governmental agency, and this commercial policy committee, or such other agency as may be designated to take its place, will make treaties as they alone see fit to make.

From time to time administration spokesmen and the college professors who are promoting the possible enactment of this legislation have spoken of inefficient industries, uneconomical industries, and have indicated in their speeches that in the agreements to be made with foreign nations only the inefficient American producer will be eliminated. They seek to find a market in foreign nations for our surplus farm products through the elimination, by way of increased imports, of what they term "our inefficient industries."

The newspapers of Monday, April 30, make reference to the supposed conversion of former Secretary of State Stimson to the policy of free trade and reciprocal trade treaties. This was to be expected. I could have told anyone in advance of the statement made by Mr. Stimson that he was not only a free-trader but that he was also an internationalist. It was known that he seldom, if ever, gave his wholehearted support to protective tariff rates while he was Secretary of State. Certainly he opposed the excise tax which protected the American coal miner, and the excise tax which protected the American oil producer; and I know from information I possess that he objected to that kind of protection.

To some this announcement of Mr. Stimson may be news; but I wish to call the attention of those who are conversant with what was happening as long ago as 1928 to a statement made by the Honorable Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, one of America's greatest men, in my judgment, whose principles, as he presents them frequently in the public forum, are sound American doctrine and safe to follow for the reason that he always has uppermost in mind the welfare of the rank and file of the citizenship. Mr. Woll, in a radio address, only last week, opposed the granting of authorization to the President to enter into reciprocal trade treaties with foreign nations without ratification by the Senate. He said, in part:

> These are precisely the same arguments as have been used for years by all those who see the solution of our economic problem, not in the increase of American mass purchasing power, but in plunging into the mad and illusory race for foreign markets. In this connection the language of Secretary Wallace and Secretary Hull does not differ a hair's-breadth from that of former President Hoover. It will be recalled that at his Newark labor speech in the campaign of 1928 Mr. Hoover offered increased exports as the solution of the unemployment problem, and that 4 years later Mr. Roosevelt responded to this speech, ridiculing Mr. Hoover's belief in markets which did not exist. Yet here are Secretary Wallace and Secretary Hull reasserting and championing the Hoover doctrine.

No doubt they are echoing the convictions or the reformation of the present Chief Executive.

It seems to me that the prestige sought by the advocates of this grant of power to the President through the proposed conversion of Mr. Stimson should have but little weight with the Senate of the United States.

What are the industries proposed to be made the subject of these reciprocal agreements?

So far we have learned that sugar, wool, lace, chemicals, fine textiles, and pottery are on the list of industries marked for slaughter.

In my section alone the pottery and china industry employs in normal times 17,000 skilled workers. Is it possible that the greatest china and pottery industry in America is to be eliminated? It will be if Mr. Wallace's principles are applied, in case the Senate of the United States passes this reciprocal tariff treaty bill.

Mordecai Ezekiel, economic adviser to the Secretary of Agriculture, in an article published in Today of April 21, 1934, openly admits that with authorization granted to the President to enter into reciprocal trade treaties with foreign nations it may be necessary for seven or eight millions of industrial workers to find employment in other industries.

Mr. President, take a man 45 or 50 years of age who has been connected from the beginning of his working life up to his present age with the pottery industry, the steel industry, or employed elsewhere in the mechanical world: How in justice and equity and under the responsibilities he has assumed to his family can he be reeducated and retrained so that he will become an efficient workman in some new industry about which he knows nothing?

Will such conditions help to restore domestic recovery? The answer is obvious.

Mr. President, I understand that the Secretary of Agriculture appeared before the Senate Finance Committee and contended that any American industry which required protection in the form of a tariff rate of 100 percent or more was inefficient or could easily be eliminated without great harm to our country.

For the information of the Senate, I have hastily compiled a list of some of the foreign products which the Tariff Commission indicates in its report to the Senate, in response to Senate Resolution 325, paid a customs duty in 1931 or 1932 in excess of 90 percent.

I feel confident that Members of the Senate who seemingly have overlooked the fact that we still have a representative form of government will be interested in looking over the list to which I refer, and which I ask to have printed as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The list is as follows:

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, it may be of interest to Senators who have given serious consideration to evading the responsibilities undertaken by them when they took the oath of office as Members of this body to glance over a list of articles or commodities which we have every reason to believe, should the President be authorized to enter into and conclude reciprocal trade treaties with foreign nations, will be eliminated from America.

These products, in the production of which many workers are employed, and which play a more or less prominent part in the make-up of our country, have been found by the United States Tariff Commission, in response to Senate Resolution 325, to be articles or commodities on which duties are levied, and which are more or less noncompetitive.

I ask that this list of articles and commodities be printed as part of my remarks, together with another list dealing with similar products.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly having been compelled to take so much of the time of the Senate in the concluding period of the session of Congress. I try to be a patriot. I try to be responsive to my country's call. I am here for service. Had I not thought, and were there not convictions in my heart and soul that the proposed legislation is incompatible with the best interests of the greatest number under the American flag, I should not have made these observations upon this occasion.

THE JAPANESE CHEMICAL INDUSTRY IN 1933

Assistant Trade Commissioner Donald W. Smith, Tokyo

The increased industrial activity, the export boom, and increased purchase of materials that could be utilized for military purposes made the year 1933 a prosperous one for the Japanese chemical industry. The increased output of rayon, paper, glassware, and iron and steel products stimulated the demand for industrial chemicals. The artificial fertilizer industry profited from the increased farm income during the first half of 1933 and the general advance in fertilizer prices. Dyestuffs manufacturers operated their plants at full capacity to meet the requirements of the cotton textile and rayon industries. The continuation of Japan's building boom and the construction activities of the Government aided paint manufacturers. A general improvement was noted in the prices of the leading crude drug exports, owing to the depreciation of the yen.

Japan's total foreign trade in chemicals was valued at 230,810,000 yen during 1933, an increase of 53,371,000 yen over the figure for 1932. Chemical imports increased by 18 percent in value while exports gained 66 percent.

The year was also one of great expansion for the Japanese chemical industry. Inspired by the desire for economic self-sufficiency in certain chemicals, new companies were organized to manufacture the items for which Japan has depended on foreign countries in the past, and the capacities of existing plants were extended to meet the increasing domestic requirements. There is apparently a strong desire to build up a chemical industry which will be independent of foreign nations in the event of a national emergency. The majority of the new chemical companies organized during the past year, however, were formed with a view to manufacturing items which can be made in Japan and for which there is a ready market. The Japanese chemical industry is well organized and is well equipped. As long as the domestic demand continues strong, Japanese chemical manufacturers will concentrate chiefly on meeting the requirements of their home market. Unfavorable conditions in Japan, affecting the domestic demand, however, would almost certainly result in a more determined effort on the part of Japanese chemical manufacturers to sell their products in world markets.

FOREIGN TRADE IN CHEMICALS, 1933

Considerable gains were noted in the value of both Japan's imports and exports of chemicals during 1933, the former indicating that the country is still far from being self-sufficient in certain items. Imports amounted to 155,298,000 yen compared with 131,881,000 yen during 1932. Exports increased to 75,520,000 yen from 45,566,000 yen. The increased imports were due chiefly to the improvement in the demand for fertilizers and fertilizer materials, and to the heavy demand for the crude chemicals required by the domestic industrial chemical industry.

The details of the value of Japan's foreign trade in chemicals follow:

Imports and exports of chemicals and allied products by groups

Group	Imports		Exports
	1932	1933	1932	1933
	Yen	Yen	Yen	Yen
Industrial chemical and allied products	46,370,000	50,715,000	18,488,000	33,440,000
Dyes, paints, and similar products	16,636,000	16,542,000	4,766,000	9,439,000
Fertilizers	61,993,000	81,875,000	3,250,000	7,474,000
Toilet preparations, drugs, medicines	6,882,000	6,166,000	2,082,000	3,748,000
Crude drugs, insecticides, and agar-agar			16,980,000	21,419,000
Total	131,881,000	155,298,000	45,566,000	75,520,000

INVESTMENT IN THE CHEMICAL INDUSTRY

At the end of 1932 the total capital investment in chemical and allied industries in Japan was 1,012,497 yen, or 7.2 percent of the total investment in all industrial corporations employing over five workmen. This figure, however, includes the capital invested in companies making rayon, oils and fats, rubber goods, paper, and celluloid products which are not covered in this report. The capital investment of the companies making the items covered in this report, including industrial chemicals, dyestuffs, medical chemicals and medicines, paints and pigments, soaps and toilet preparations, matches, artificial fertilizers, and other chemicals, amounted to 510,839,040 yen, divided as follows:

Capital investment in Japanese chemical industry as of December 1932 [1]

Class of chemicals	Number of companies	Paid-up capital
		Yen
Industrial chemicals	201	71,107,066
Artificial fertilizers	173	230,072,789
Medicinal chemicals and prepared medicines	473	91,111,625
Dyestuffs	16	9,055,000
Paints and pigments	158	22,794,550

More new capital was invested in the chemical industry during 1933 than in any other industry, according to the published figures of the Bank of Japan. Thirty-three new companies with an aggregate capital of 102,920,000 yen were organized during the year, and eight companies increased their capital by 66,950,000 yen, making a total of 169,870,000 yen in new capital invested in the industry during the year compared with the total of 368,119,000 yen new capital invested in all industries during 1933. The figures given above, however, include the capital investment of newly formed rayon companies, and probably not more than one third of the total amount of new capital invested during 1933 was for the purpose of organizing companies to manufacture the chemical products covered in this report.

INDUSTRIAL CHEMICALS

Japanese production of industrial chemicals was stimulated during 1933 by the activity in the rayon, paper, glass, fertilizer, and other industries. The output of rayon, foreign-style paper, plate glass, and chemical fertilizers reached new high-record levels during the year, thereby creating an unprecedented demand for such items as caustic soda, sulphuric acid, nitric acid, and soda ash. The military replenishment program also brought about a heavy demand for explosives and materials for the production of explosives.

In 1931, the latest year for which details are available, the value of the industrial chemical output in Japan amounted to 113,547,701 yen. Owing to the increased output during the last 2 years and the advance in quotations on industrial chemicals, it is estimated that the value of the production of this class of chemicals in Japan during 1933 was at least 200,000,000 yen, and probably very much higher.

The only industrial chemical items for which official 1933 production figures are available are caustic soda, bleaching powder, soda ash, and sulphur.

SULPHURIC ACID

Sulphuric-acid production was stimulated during 1933 by the increased output of superphosphates, sulphate of ammonia, iron and steel products, and explosives. The annual production capacity of sulphuric-acid plants at the beginning of 1933 was 2,513,000 metric tons at 50° B. This was increased during the year to approximately 2,600,000 metric tons at 50° B. Production during 1933 was estimated by a leading producer at 1,980,000 metric tons, or 76 percent of capacity, while during 1932 it was 1,656,000 metric tons, or 65 percent of capacity, according to a Japanese chemical journal. Of the 1933 output, 640,000 metric tons were used in the manufacture of superphosphates, 840,000 tons for ammonium sulphate, and 500,000 tons in other industries.

The Japanese supply of sulphuric acid of 50° B. is produced by 35 companies in 54 plants, the equipment including 115 lead chambers and 37 towers. Fuming sulphuric acid is made in 7 plants, including 3 Army arsenals, the annual capacity being estimated at 31,500 metric tons (as of 25 percent SO_3). The country has an adequate supply of raw materials for this important item in domestic pyrites.

CAUSTIC SODA

The activity in Japan's textile, paper, and soap industries, and the remarkable expansion of the rayon industry have greatly increased the demand for caustic soda during the past 2 years. Japanese consumption of caustic soda in 1933 was estimated at approximately 100,000 metric tons, of which about 40,000 tons was consumed in the manufacture of rayon. The production capacity is about 160,000 metric tons, and actual production during 1933 was approximately 107,000 tons. The Caustic Soda Manufacturers' Association allowed its members to produce at only 55 percent of capacity during 1933. The most important Japanese manufacturer, Nihon Soda Industry Co., is not a member of the association, and it produced at almost full capacity, or about 65,000 metric tons.

There was an increasing tendency during 1933 for Japanese soda-ash manufacturers to convert soda ash into caustic soda. Several of the larger companies have announced their intention of increasing their output of caustic during 1934 by this method, in anticipation of the further expansion of the rayon industry. Although Japan is practically self-sufficient in the matter of caustic soda, it is still necessary to import some crude caustic soda for domestic manufacturers, but the increased amount of caustic soda produced from soda ash has reduced the imports of crude caustic soda from 41,612 metric tons in 1931 to only 12,527 tons in 1933.

SODA ASH

The domestic production of soda ash in 1933 showed an increase of over 100 percent over the 1931 output, owing to the increased manufacture of caustic soda from this product and the heavy demand from the Japanese glass industry.

Production of 200,000 metric tons of soda ash during 1933 represented the capacity output of the industry, but increases in the production capacity of existing companies are being planned for 1934. The import of 46,461 metric tons of soda ash and natural soda in 1933 was probably chiefly natural soda.

The domesic soda-ash industry has been aided to a considerable extent by the Japanese Government through the granting of subsidies to manufacturers. The 1932 and 1933 budgets of the Department of Commerce and Industry contained the sums of 470,410 yen and 50,129 yen, respectively, for the encouragement of the soda-ash industry in Japan.

SODIUM CHLORIDE (SALT)

The consumption of industrial salt in Japan in 1933 was over 800,000 metric tons, or almost double that for the previous year, owing to the increased production of alkalies. Although the country has become practically self-sufficient in alkali, the domestic industry is entirely dependent on foreign countries for its supply of industrial salt. During 1933 imports of salt amounted to 887,237 metric tons, of which 140,000 tons came from Kwantung Leased Territory, 120,000 tons from China, 35,000 tons from Manchuria, and the rest from African countries. The dependence of Japan's chemical industry on foreign countries for a supply of salt has caused some concern to the Government, and efforts are being made to interest Japanese industrialists in exploiting the salt fields in Manchuria. It appears probable that a special company will be organized to exploit the Manchurian salt deposits and that the capital will be furnished by Japanese chemical concerns.

SULPHUR

The output of 104,055 metric tons of sulphur in Japan in 1933 was the highest output recorded since the World War records of 1916 and 1917. Compared with the previous year, the 1933 output shows a gain of 26,970 metric tons, or 35 percent. The heavy output during the past year was stimulated by home and export demands. Exports of sulphur, which amounted to only 14,188 metric tons in 1931, increased to 26,000 tons in 1932 and to 32,127 tons during 1933. Details of the destination of Japan's exports of sulphur during 1933 are not yet available, but in the previous year most of the sulphur exported from Japan was shipped to Australia and New Zealand.

Pyrites statistics are not available.

METHANOL

The increasing demand for methanol for the production of formaldehyde and for use as solvents in the paint and dyestuffs industries led to the development of a synthetic methanol industry during 1933. The sharp rise in imports of methanol, from 2,200 tons in 1931 to over 4,000 tons during 1932 and 1933, attracted the interest of Japanese industrialists, and three companies were formed during the year to supply the country's needs of this item by synthetic methods. Two companies with a combined annual output of 3,000 metric tons were in operation at the end of the year, and a third company, with an annual production capacity of 1,500 metric tons will be in operation before the summer of 1934.

CALCIUM CARBIDE

Production of calcium carbide during 1933 as reported by the Carbide Sales Association amounted to 227,000 metric tons, while the demand during the year reached 228,944 tons. The calcium carbide output during 1933 showed only a slight increase over the 1932 production but compared with the 1931 production, a gain of 33 percent was registered. Details of the consumption of calcium carbide in Japan during 1933, as reported by the Carbide Sales Association, follow:

CONSUMPTION OF CALCIUM CARBIDE IN JAPAN, 1933

Since the formation of the Carbide Sales Association in June 1931 the market has been more effectively controlled and prices have advanced.

OTHER INDUSTRIAL CHEMICALS

The value of production of compressed gases, including oxygen, hydrogen, ammonia gas, carbon dioxide, and chlorine during 1931 was 32,749,339 yen, or 29 percent of the total value of all industrial chemical items. It is probable that during 1933 the value of the production of compressed gases rose to 50,000,000 yen.

Nitric acid and acetic acid are also important items produced by Japan's chemical industry, the country being on an export basis. The consumption of glycerin has risen sharply during the past few years, and the domestic production stimulated, the 1933 output being estimated at approximately 7,000 metric tons.

IMPORTS

Imports of industrial chemicals into Japan during 1933 were valued at 50,714,484 yen, compared with 46,369,675 yen during 1932.

The following table shows the details of imports of industrial chemicals into Japan by volume and value during 1932 and 1933:

EXPORTS

Heavy gains were registered during 1933 in the exports of acetic acid, calcium carbide, chlorate of potash, explosives, matches, sulphur, and sulphide of soda, while the volume of arsenious acid, iodide of potash, and iodine exported was considerably below the 1932 figures.

The volume and value of the exports of industrial chemicals from Japan during 1932 and 1933 follow:

FERTILIZERS

There was a definite improvement in the Japanese fertilizer trade during 1933. Although agricultural conditions were most unfavorable at the close of the year, owing to declining silk prices and an overproduction of the country's most important crop—rice—high prices were obtained for the spring and summer cocoon crops, and farm income—at least during the first half of the year—was estimated at approximately 12 percent higher than during the same period of the previous year. The favorable factors affecting the demand for fertilizers during the first half of the year were reflected by increased domestic production of the leading artificial fertilizers and a general advance in fertilizer prices. The outlook for the coming year is not promising, as the present level of farm prices is so low that fertilizer purchases must, of necessity, be reduced to a minimum. The high productive capacity of the arable land in Japan has been made possible only by the intensive application of fertilizers, however, and there is a definite limit to which farmers may reduce their purchases of fertilizers.

PRODUCTION

The average annual value of fertilizer production in Japan proper during the 5-year period—1928–32—was 169,927,472 yen. The 1932 output was valued at 157,989,246 yen, and the estimated value of the 1933 production in Japan proper was probably in the neighborhood of 200,000,000 yen. The production of mineral fertilizers, including sulphate of ammonia, cyanamide, and superphosphates, during 1932 was valued at 81,798,323 yen. The following table, compiled from the Statistical Abstract of the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry, 1931–32, shows the value of fertilizer production by classes during 1931 and 1932:

Fertilizer production, Japan proper, 1931–32

Miscellaneous	83,651	47,835
Total	124,726,675	157,989,246

The output of superphosphates during 1933 amounted to 1,127,977 metric tons, compared with 1,037,730 tons during 1932, while sulphate of ammonia production increased to 713,746 tons from 684,887 tons.

PRICES

Quotations of the leading fertilizers were higher during 1933 than during the previous year. Domestic sulphate of ammonia in sacks averaged 94.13 yen per metric ton during 1933, compared with 72.80 yen in 1932. Imported sulphate of ammonia, in bulk, advanced from 71.45 yen during 1932 to 93.12 yen in 1933. The increase in sulphate of ammonia prices was largely due to the effective price control by the Sulphate of Ammonia Distribution Guild. Cyanamide quotations advanced from 0.134 yen per unit of 1 percent to 0.150 yen. Bean-cake prices also showed a slight gain, the average quotation during 1933 being 3.52 yen per 100 kin (1 kin equals 1.32 pounds), compared with 3.37 yen per 100 kin during 1932. During the latter part of 1933 quotations on Chilean nitrates were below sulphate of ammonia quotations. Only one other important fertilizer showed a decline in price during 1933, namely, superphosphate. Prices which had averaged 1.10 yen per sack of 7½ kwan (19.5 percent) during 1932, averaged only 1.03 yen per sack during 1933.

IMPORTS

The total imports of fertilizers and fertilizer materials into Japan during 1933 amounted to 1,615,354 metric tons valued at 81,875,482 yen, compared with 1,527,781 tons valued at 61,993,416 yen in 1932.

Details concerning the countries of origin of Japan's fertilizer imports during 1933 are not yet available, but during the first half of the year the following fertilizers were imported from the United States:

EXPORTS

Japanese exports of fertilizers almost doubled in quantity and more than doubled in value during 1933 compared with the previous year. Total exports during 1933 amounted to 31,234 metric tons of artificial fertilizers and 52,634 tons of other fertilizers, compared with 25,300 tons of artificial fertilizers and 18.659 tons of other fertilizers during 1932.

Details showing the countries to which this fertilizer was shipped are not yet available. It is believed, however, that most of the artificial fertilizer exported during 1933 was sulphate of ammonia and that the majority was shipped to the United States.

DYESTUFFS

Since the World War Japanese dyestuffs manufacturers have been encouraged and aided by the Government in building up an industry which would make the country independent of foreign nations in the matter of dyestuffs. The Government aid to the domestic industry has been in three forms: Protective tariff, a commercial treaty with Germany, and subsidies to the leading manufacturers. In 1933 the leading manufacturers claimed that they were able to produce all of the 283 colors included in the Government program of self-sufficiency in dyestuffs.

The protective tariffs need no explanation, except that further increases would no doubt be made if necessary to give additional protection to the domestic industry. The commercial treaty made with Germany in 1928 covering dyestuffs provides that certain dyes and intermediates may be imported only with the consent of the Japanese Government. The subsidies to manufacturers have been in the nature of direct cash grants from funds appropriated for the Department of Commerce and Industry. During the past 5 years the total subsidies have amounted to approximately 5,000,000 yen, the 1933–34 budget providing for subsidies amounting to 1,101,291 yen. The largest subsidies during recent years have been granted to the manufacturers of artificial indigo, 1,571,811 yen having been appropriated during the fiscal years 1932–33 and 1933–34 for this item. It is reported that no further subsidies will be granted to dyestuffs manufacturers.

The increasing importance of the woolen-goods industry in Japan is receiving the serious attention of the leading dyestuffs manufacturers, and they have announced that during 1934 they will concentrate on the production of dyes for this industry.

PRODUCTION

It is conservatively estimated that the production of synthetic dyestuffs in Japan during 1933 increased by approximately 40 percent in volume over the output during 1932. The increased production of cotton textiles and rayon during 1933 probably increased the demand for dyestuffs by at least one third. On the basis of the visible supply and demand for dyestuffs during the years 1931 and 1932, it is estimated that the production of dyestuffs in Japan during 1933 amounted to 19,800,000 kilos and that the consumption was approximately 14,700,000 kilos. Imports of synthetic dyestuffs fell from 1,975,870 kilos during 1932 to 972,150 kilos during 1933, while exports increased from 4,521,231 to 6,083,849 kilos. The following table shows the visible supply and demand for dyestuffs in Japan during 1931 and 1932 and the estimated supply and demand during 1933:

Japanese supply of synthetic dyestuffs

Total available for consumption	9,645,430	11,303,641	14,693,150

As sulphur dyes have accounted for approximately 80 percent of the total output of all synthetic dyes made in Japan during the past few years, and the exports of sulphur dyes for about 90 percent of the total exports of all dyes, it is believed that a better idea of the supply and demand for synthetic dyestuffs in Japan during the past 3 years may be obtained from the following table, which does not include sulphur colors:

It will be noted from the above table that during 1933 there was an estimated increase in production of synthetic dyestuffs, excluding sulphur dyes, of approximately 65 percent, which more or less agrees with the estimates of 1933 production made by the leading manufacturers.

The only official figures available on dyestuffs production during 1933 are on aniline and indigo. According to the monthly production report of the Department of Commerce and Industry, the output of aniline for the first 11 months of 1933 amounted to 2,713,173 kilos, valued at 2,780,064 yen, compared with 2,184,457 kilos, valued at 1,572,609 yen, during the same period of 1932. Indigo output during the first half of 1933 amounted to 247,098 kilos, valued at 1,045,225 yen, while that for the entire year 1932 totaled 164,643 kilos, valued at 630,331 yen. The domestic production of indigo during 1933 almost entirely displaced foreign imports of this item, the imports during the year amounting to less than 10,000 kilos.

IMPORTS

The decline in the volume of imports of synthetic dyestuffs during 1933 from that in the previous year indicates the progress made by Japanese dyestuffs manufacturers over the past 2 years. Domestic producers have, however, been aided by the depreciation of the yen, which has made the price of foreign dyestuffs prohibitive since the embargo on the export of gold in December 1931. A rise in the value of the yen would almost certainly mean an increase in imports of certain dyestuffs, despite the development of the domestic industry, as it is believed that there are many dyes required by Japanese textile and rayon manufacturers which can be produced more economically abroad than in Japan.

There were no changes in the relative positions of the three leading suppliers of dyestuffs to Japan during 1933, the order in relative importance being Germany, Switzerland, and the United States. The value of imports of synthetic dyes from Germany, however, increased from 52 percent of the total during 1932 to 62 percent of the total during 1933, the Swiss share dropped from 22 percent of the total to 15 percent, and that of the United States dropped from 13 percent to 11 percent.

The details of imports of synthetic dyestuffs, by kinds, into Japan during 1932 and 1933 follow:

Exports of coal-tar dyes during 1933 amounted to 6,116,249 kilos, valued at 2,895,974 yen, compared with 4,521,231 kilos valued at 1,522,648 yen in 1932.

PAINTS, PIGMENTS, COATINGS, AND FILLING MATTER

The Japanese paint industry has prospered during the past 2 years owing to the construction activity in Japan proper and to the growing demand in other Asiatic countries for Japanese paints. The following estimates of the annual output of paints and pigments in Japan were taken from the Japanese newspapers, the Osaka Mainichi and Tokyo Nichi Nichi.

JAPANESE PAINT AND PIGMENT PRODUCTION

	Kilos
Paints:
Enamels	6,000,000
Other paints	20,000,000

Pigments:
Zinc oxide	13,000,000
Red lead	7,000,000
Lithopone	2,000,000
Barytes	2,000,000

According to one of the leading manufacturers of paint in Tokio, the 1933 output of ships-bottom paint was approximately 2,000,000 kilos and the output of white lead about 1,500,000 kilos.

IMPORTS

Japan is almost entirely independent of other countries in the matter of paints, imports being limited to small quantities of anticorrosive paints from England. Imports of carbon black, however, are important, increasing from 2,437,280 kilos in 1932 to 3,766,260 kilos in 1933. These figures do not include imports from Taiwan which have recently become important, the exports from that country to Japan during the first 11 months of 1933 amounting to 1,200,658 kilos, according to a recent report from American Consul John B. Ketchem.

Japan's imports of toilet preparations, drugs, soaps, and patent medicines consist chiefly of botanicals which are not obtainable in this country and certain medicines and toilet preparations for the consumption of the foreign population and wealthier Japanese.

EXPORTS

Japanese exports of toilet preparations and medicines increased sharply during 1933 as compared with the previous year. Although exporters were aided to a considerable extent by the depreciation of the yen during the past year, it is believed that the volume of trade secured in dentifrices and toilet preparations during 1933 is only a beginning, and that exports of these items will become greater as Japanese merchants learn the requirements of the Asiatic markets. The exports of medicines are believed to be chiefly Japanese remedies for Japanese subjects residing abroad. The following table shows the details of exports of toilet preparations, prepared perfumeries, soaps, and patent medicines during 1932 and 1933. The exports of crude drugs will be covered in a separate section.

CRUDE DRUGS, INSECTICIDES, AND AGAR-AGAR

EXPORTS

The value of Japan's exports of crude drugs, including camphor and menthol, insecticides, including pyrethrum flowers and agar-agar, increased in value from 16,979,919 yen during 1932 to 21,419,416 yen in 1933. Increases were noted in the volume of exports of camphor and menthol, owing partly to heavier shipments of these items to the United States. The United States, Japan's best customer for pyrethrum flowers, purchased about 18 percent less in volume during 1933 than during the previous year, but the average value rose from 83.50 yen per 100 kilos to 124.80 yen per 100 kilos. Shipments to the United States of Japanese agar-agar during 1933 increased almost 40 percent in volume over the previous year.

WAGE CONDITIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I desire to invite the attention of the Senate to some developments in connection with the labor situation here in Washington, particularly in connection with the Federal building program.

Some of the charges which are being made would indicate that the situation here is appalling. There ought, of course, to be the fullest investigation. I understand that a resolution is pending in the House of Representatives—I do not know that it has been adopted yet—looking toward such an examination and investigation of the facts. If the House does not go through with the investigation, the Senate should take it up.

Last Friday there appeared in the Washington Herald an article with the headline, "$500,000 Wage Racket in U.S. Work Charged."

Then there is this very startling opening paragraph:

Employment of labor on some of the $100,000,000 Federal building projects in the District of Columbia is in the hands of racketeers.

More than $500,000 already has been illegally diverted from wages and pockets by crooked contractors.

If $500,000 has been diverted from wages, that means it is being taken from American laboring men and women and their children; and how such a condition as that could be permitted to go on in the Capital City of the Nation is beyond understanding.

Some of these charges would seem to be almost incredible, and yet they have been given the widest currency. Therefore, I repeat that, of course, they should be thoroughly investigated.

I continue reading:

Hundreds of employees have been forced to accept ownership stock in lieu of wages.

Dummy corporations have been chartered in the form of subcontractors who force workmen to accept smaller pay, thus illegally increasing the profits of the original contractor.

Workmen who threatened to expose these practices by contractors have been told they would be fired and blacklisted by other contractors unless they continued to work for wages offered them.

All artifices of clever legal minds have been used to divert public funds from the purses of the poor laborer for which the building program was originally devised by Congress.

I have been informed—I do not know whether it is entirely true or not—that where wages of $11 a day were paid to some of those engaged in the building trades, they were forced to give back as much as $8 of the $11 to the contractors, leaving the worker himself with only $3 of the original $11; and yet these contractors are bold enough to carry on nefarious schemes of this kind right in the shadow of the White House and of the dome of the Nation's Capitol.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do.

Mr. BORAH. How was that information secured?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The information I have given, excepting the last item, is taken literally from this publication in the Washington Herald of last Friday.

Mr. BORAH. I was wondering how the Herald got the information. It seems to me if they have the information, if it is in somebody's possession, it ought to be acted upon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not sure how the Herald obtained the information.

Mr. BORAH. In other words if they know that these statements are facts, they must know who the guilty parties are, and who the parties to the transaction are, and it would be easy to proceed against them. The Herald, I apprehend, would be glad to give the facts to the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Even so, Mr. President, the Senator will admit that everybody's business is nobody's business. Somebody ought to investigate it and go into it, and then see that indictments are drawn against those who are discovered to be culpable.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAYDEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I will state that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], who has been very active in ferreting out this malpractice, introduced a bill, which came before the Committee on the Judiciary, which I think was reported unanimously, looking to action so that there might be something done in an effective way to prohibit that practice. I am not familiar with whether or not it is against the law now, but the Senator from New York introduced a bill to break up the practice. It seemed that he had heard of the practice in advance of the publicity given to it, and had taken the precaution of introducing a bill to try to break it up.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In connection with the observation of the Senator from Idaho, I may say that it makes no difference where the Washington Herald gets the information, the fact is that the information now has come to us as they have given it to us. It is not enough for the Senate of the United States to state that there is nothing we can do as long as the information may be in the files of a newspaper. It is now up to the Senate, it seems to me, and to the people's representatives, to investigate these charges, to see whether or not there is any truth in them. That is the point I make.

Mr. BORAH. It may be true that there should be an investigation, but I was wondering why, if the facts are already available, why the authorities have not acted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, that is precisely the reason why I am bringing this matter now to the attention of the Senate, hoping that some action will be forced through additional publicity.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, as stated by the Senator from Louisiana, the committee of which the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is chairman made an investigation of this subject, and found that in many localities the practice was being pursued of paying laborers liberal compensation, and then taking back a part of the compensation. Thereupon, the committee reported a bill, which passed the Senate unanimously, but, on account of some complaint which was filed, and the fear that it might have a broader effect than was intended, a motion was made by the Senator from Indiana, I think, to recall the bill from the House of Representatives. At my suggestion no action was taken on the motion to recall the bill from the House, and it was stated that conferences were being held with a view to working out some amendment. It is for that reason that express legislation penalizing such conduct has not already become law.

Unquestionably the practice is to be condemned not only as immoral, but as one of the very worst forms of racketeering. The point I am making is that there does not appear to be any necessity for further investigation. What is needed is legislation strengthening the arm of the Federal authorities so that this form of racketeering may be promptly and effectively punished.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, if the Senator is referring to the two bills which, at the request of American labor, I moved to have reconsidered, I doubt whether they would go to this question at all. I do not think they have any reference to any such thing as that to which I am calling the attention of the Senate. If these charges be true, there is plenty of law on the statute books to reach the culprits without any additional legislation. I certainly hope that American workers cannot be forced to yield up their wages at the most flagrant demand of these racketeering contractors. Are we to understand that they have no remedy, unless the Senate and the House should sometime in the future enact a law giving them a remedy? I think the remedy is on the books now.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not understand that there is any question, from what we have heard from the committee investigating the subject, and others investigating it, that the charges are fairly well substantiated. As I understand it, there was a clause in the contracts that the contractors were to pay the wage earners $11 a day. That was the basis upon which they secured their contracts. I understand that they went to the extent of reducing the wages down to around $8 a day, sometimes by compelling refunds. The Senator from New York, as I understand it—and he had a rather full committee meeting—introduced a bill, which was reported by the committee, and I had understood it passed the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Right along that line, permit me to read a very plain statement made by the press.

Since 1928, $2,000,000 belonging to the workers has been taken from their pay envelops and put in the purses of the contractors, many of them outsiders, in this city alone, it is believed. No estimate has been made as to how much this will amount to all over the country.

Although administration officials have shown indifference to the pleas of labor to put an end to what is described as the largest job racket in the history of the country, the United States Treasury has already forced half a dozen local contractors to disgorge $15,000 and give it back to the rightful owners—the workmen.

That statement is made plainly.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in asking my questions, I am not asking them in criticism of anybody, but it is within the power of the Government which has permitted these contracts to be executed upon a certain basis, upon the payment of a certain amount, when it ascertains that that is not being done, to call the contractors in, give them a hearing and, if the contracts are being violated, the Government has a perfect right to terminate the contracts.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Precisely, and that is why I am trying to emphasize on the floor of the Senate the conditions which seem to exist.

I do not care to go into the matter any further, except that I think this article ought to go into the RECORD, and I ask especially that the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], whom I know has been investigating matters of this kind, take note of the article. I shall personally bring it to his attention.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REYNOLDS in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no hesitancy in saying that anyone, whether he be an official or merely a private citizen, who gives support to any such practice as that brought to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from Indiana, is deserving of condemnation, and of punishment, insofar as the law authorizes it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the article printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Herald]

FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLAR WAGE RACKET IN UNITED STATES WORK CHARGED—MCFADDEN DEMANDS INQUIRY INTO ALLEGED GRAFT OF CONTRACTORS ON BUILDINGS HERE

Employment of labor on some of the $100,000,000 Federal building projects in the District of Columbia is in the hands of racketeers.

More than $500,000 already has been illegally diverted from wages and pocketed by crooked contractors.

These and other charges, some of them so sensational as to be unbelievable, are behind the resolution offered on the floor of the House late yesterday afternoon by Representative MCFADDEN (R.), of Pennsylvania.

DUMMY CORPORATIONS

MCFADDEN demands an immediate investigation of the activities of all contractors engaged in Federal construction work in the District of Columbia.

Based on material furnished by the Washington Herald and revealed for the first time by the Herald today, MCFADDEN says he is ready to prove scores of violations of the Bacon-Davis Act and asks the appointment of a committee of five for an immediate investigation.

Among the other charges which will be made are:

Hundreds of employees have been forced to accept ownership stock in lieu of wages.

Dummy corporations have been chartered in the form of subcontractors who force workmen to accept smaller pay, thus illegally increasing the profits of the original contractor.

WORKMEN THREATENED

Workmen who threatened to expose these practices by contractors have been told they would be fired and blacklisted by other contractors unless they continued to work for wages offered them.

All artifices of clever legal minds have been used to divert public funds from the purses of the poor laborer for which the building program was originally devised by Congress.

Since 1928, $2,000,000 belonging to the workers has been taken from their pay envelops and put in the purses of the contractors, many of them outsiders, in this city alone, it is believed. No estimate has been made as to how much this will amount to all over the country.

SOME PLUNDER RETURNED

Although administration officials have shown indifference to the pleas of labor to put an end to what is described as the largest job racket in the history of the country, the United States Treasury has already forced half a dozen local contractors to disgorge $15,000 and give it back to the rightful owners—the workmen.

Secret hearings have been held at star chamber proceedings to "protect" the contractors, although a number of the offenders have been put out of business. The Herald will disclose the proceedings of these hearings exclusively, in future articles.

Three portfolios of sensational evidence, in the form of photostats of canceled checks and affidavits were shown to Representative MCFADDEN by Albert Caya, business agent of the Carpenters' District Council, and J. B. Lagasa, both acting for 3,000 joiners and carpenters in this area.

OVER LONG PERIOD

MCFADDEN was shocked when confronted with the weight of evidence gathered by Caya and Lagasa for the past 2 years that, after introducing his resolution on the floor of the House, he declared:

"I have offered this resolution for an immediate investigation into the conduct of Federal building projects in the District because of information of apparently unquestionable veracity which has been conveyed to me.

"Evidence is available that wage rates prevailing in Washington have been ignored in violation of the law; that wages due have not been paid, and that workers who have asked for their money have been threatened with discharge.

"The requested investigation is not in any way partisan. I am informed these practices began in the last administration. The Herald has evidence to show that diversion of funds from workers' pay envelopes, occurred in both past and present administrations. A situation so deplorable should be dealt with without any thought of politics."

M'FADDEN'S REQUEST

The McFadden resolution, which was offered to the Committee on Rules and ordered to be printed, reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the Speaker is authorized and directed to appoint a select committee to be composed of 5 members of the House, 1 of whom he shall designate as chairman. The committee is authorized and directed to investigate the activities of general contractors engaged in Federal construction work in the District of Columbia, particularly with reference to the withholding of the pay, or any portion of the pay due workmen employed by them on such work in violation of Public Act No. 798, approved March 3, 1931 (46 Stat. 1494), known as the "Bacon-Davis Act." The committee shall, as soon as practicable, but not later than the termination of the present Congress, report to the House the results of its investigation, together with such recommendations for legislation, as it deems advisable.

"SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths and affirmations, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done and to make such expenditures as it deems necessary."

WAGE PROTECTION LAW

The Bacon-Davis Act, passed under the Hoover administration, provided that in the case of every contract for a public-works project of more than $5,000 the prevailing rate of wages in the vicinity of the construction must be paid.

In a subsequent Executive order President Hoover laid down the following stipulation:

"It is expressly understood and agreed that the aforesaid wages shall be paid unconditionally in full not less often than once a week and in lawful money of the United States, to the full amount accrued to each individual at time of payment and without subsequent deduction or rebate on any account."

HUNGRY MEN VICTIMS

MCFADDEN stated that he will demand that immediate action be taken by the House to carry the investigation to the limit and to put a stop to racketeering on Federal projects. He added:

"Various questionable devices have been used to avoid payment of wages due. That these devices were unfair is evidenced by the fact that when complaint has been made by organized labor officials, employing contractors have been forced to make full restoration.

"Such practices defeat the aims under which funds for these projects were appropriated by Congress and allotted by the Executive. Graft which extorts toll from hungry men and their families is an exposition of greed and depravity which cannot be tolerated."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas subsequently said: Mr. President, some moments ago the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], who is not now in the Chamber, made a brief statement and had printed in the RECORD an article published in the Washington Herald relating to racketeering in the matter of employment on public building contracts in the city of Washington. During the course of the colloquy which occurred at that time I took occasion to condemn the practice to which the Senator from Indiana referred, and stated that a bill on the subject, reported by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] from the special committee of which he is chairman, after having passed the Senate, was recalled or that a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was entered by the Senator from Indiana. I have since investigated the RECORD and find that the latter statement was incorrect.

The bill applicable to the subject matter to which the Senator from Indiana referred is the bill (S. 3041) to effectuate the purpose of certain statutes concerning rates of pay for labor by making it unlawful to prevent anyone from receiving the compensation contracted for thereunder, and for other purposes. That bill passed the Senate on April 26 and is now awaiting consideration in the House of Representatives. The bill is aimed directly at such nefarious practices as were referred to by the Senator from Indiana in his statement. I ask that a copy of the bill introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], to which I have just referred, may be printed as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever shall induce any person employed in the construction, prosecution, or completion of any public building, public work, or building or work financed in whole or in part by loans or grants from the United States, or in the repair thereof to give up any part of the compensation to which he is entitled under his contract of employment, by force intimidation, threat of procuring dismissal from such employment, or by any other manner whatsoever, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

SEC. 2. To aid in the enforcement of the above section, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior jointly shall make reasonable regulations for contractors or subcontractors on any such building or work, including a provision that each contractor and subcontractor shall furnish weekly a sworn affidavit with respect to the wages paid each employee during the preceding week.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to say a word about this matter if I may.

I have observed the articles in the various publications in Washington about the so-called "kick-back." It will be recalled that the other day when the bill was before the Senate I explained that our committee had held hearings. We had, as a matter of fact, extensive hearings on this very subject. It is one of the vilest practices of which I ever heard. I suppose every one is to blame for it, because the laborers themselves in their anxiety to get jobs—and we cannot blame them for that in these days—have indicated a willingness to make a rebate. The story was told our committee that they would actually bid against each other for the jobs by putting matches in their hatbands. Two matches in a hatband meant that particular man was willing to turn back $2 a day, three matches meant $3 a day, and even $4 a day. I am frank to say that I am satisfied that a tremendous scandal may be uncovered regarding this particular practice.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. During the course of the colloquy to which I referred a moment ago while I had the floor, it did not appear whether there are existing Federal statutes under which prosecutions may be instituted against contractors indulging in the very objectionable practice referred to.

Mr. COPELAND. It was the opinion of our committee, after receiving testimony from competent persons, that there are not at the present time statutes which will reach this particular evil. The bill which the Senator just placed in the RECORD provides that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior, who have charge of public works, shall jointly make regulations requiring contractors and subcontractors to furnish every week a sworn affidavit as to the amount of money actually paid, not alone in toto, but to each individual employee, so that there shall be some way of reaching the subcontractor or contractor or other person who is taking money from the pockets of the laborers. To my mind, the bill which has just been referred to is a very important bill. It will do much good, we hope, in correcting this vile evil.

The other day when I was speaking, I read a letter from Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. He called attention to the condition and endorsed the bill. He said it was a corrective measure which should be put into effect, and I hope it will soon receive favorable attention at the other end of the Capitol and become a law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in order that the RECORD may be complete, in my remarks in the colloquy with the Senator from Indiana reference was made to two bills which had passed the Senate, and respecting which the Senator from Indiana had made motions for reconsideration. The two bills referred to were Senate bill 2248, to protect trade and commerce against interference by violence, threats, coercion, or intimidation; and Senate bill 2249, applying the powers of the Federal Government, under the commerce clause of the Constitution, to extortion by means of telephone, telegraph, radio, oral message, or otherwise. The Senator from Indiana did not move to recall or to reconsider Senate bill 3041, which is the measure applicable to racketeering in employment, and which, as I have already stated, passed this body on the 26th of April.

ABOLISHMENT OF OFFICE OF ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REYNOLDS in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

To the Congress:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 16 of the act of March 3, 1933 (ch. 212, 47 Stat. 1517), as amended by title III of the act of March 20, 1933 (ch. 3, 48 Stat. 16), I am transmitting herewith an Executive order providing for the abolishment of the office of the Alien Property Custodian and the transfer of its functions to the Department of Justice.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 1, 1934.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7835) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes; that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 to the said bill, and concurred therein, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate, and that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13 to the bill.

REPLENISHMENT OF CONTINGENT FUND OF THE SENATE

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the concurrent resolution (S.Con. Res. No. 14), as follows:

Whereas H.R. 8617, the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1935, passed by the House on March 22, 1934, contains a provision on page 9, beginning in line 12 and extending down to and including a part of line 17, as follows:

"For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers of committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, $144,455"; and

Whereas the Senate adopted an amendment (no. 21) to the foregoing provision, as follows: On page 9, line 17, strike out "$144,455" and insert "$268,955, of which $150,000 shall be for the fiscal year 1934"; and

Whereas the conferees, in their report on the said bill, which was adopted by both Houses, recommended that the House recede from its disagreement to the said amendment and agree to the same, said amendment therefore not being subject to further amendment; and

Whereas the joint resolution (H.J.Res. 332) to provide appropriations to meet urgent needs in certain public services, and for other purposes, passed by the House on April 26, 1934, was amended by the Senate by inserting on page 1, after line 6, certain language, of which the following is a part:

"SENATE

"For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers of committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, fiscal year 1934, $150,000"; and

Whereas the foregoing amendment is a duplication of the appropriation of $150,000 for the fiscal year 1934, as contained in the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1935: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the event the Senate amendment to the foregoing joint resolution (H.J.Res. 332) is agreed to by the House of Representatives and the existing differences of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill H.R. 8617, the Legislative Branch Appropriation Bill, 1935, are adjusted, the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby authorized and directed, in the enrollment of the said bill H.R. 8617, to insert, in lieu of the language contained in said Senate amendment no. 21, the following: "$118,955."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will not the Senator from South Carolina accompany the resolution with a short explanation of the reasons for it and what it purports to do?

Mr. BYRNES. I shall be glad to do so.

The legislative bill authorized an appropriation for the contingent fund of the Senate not only for the fiscal year 1935 but an amount for the fiscal year 1934, with which to pay a number of employees who have been engaged in connection with the so-called "stock-exchange investigation", the air-mail investigation, and some other investigations ordered by the Senate.

A partial report on the legislative appropriation bill was agreed upon by the conferees. That partial report included the amount necessary to replenish the contingent fund. The legislative appropriation bill, however, remains in dispute between the two Houses. Within the last few days a joint resolution has come to the Senate from the House of Representatives carrying an appropriation for the contingent fund of the House. Because there is no money in the contingent fund of the Senate, and certain employees are now embarrassed as a result of that deficiency, the Senate Appropriations Committee suggested an amendment to that joint resolution, which amendment was adopted by the Senate providing an appropriation for the contingent fund of the Senate for the remainder of the present fiscal year. Therefore, the necessary amount is provided not only in the joint resolution but also in the partial conference report on the legislative appropriation bill. This concurrent resolution is designed to correct that situation and to authorize the engrossing clerk of the House, in case the joint resolution shall be finally passed, to eliminate from the partial report on the legislative bill the amount which was heretofore agreed upon by the conferees on the part of the two Houses.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the difficulty I experience is that a few days ago, at the instance of the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], the contingent fund was replenished by means of an appropriate joint resolution. What relation has the concurrent resolution now offered to the joint resolution which the Senator from Tennessee had passed on Friday last?

Mr. BYRNES. That joint resolution makes necessary the concurrent resolution now before the Senate, for the reason that the appropriation which was made possible by the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee was added to the joint resolution which originated in the House and provided only an appropriation for the contingent fund of the House. If the joint resolution shall be passed, as it will be within the next few days, then there will remain in the partial conference report on the legislative appropriation bill an amount for the same purpose. The conferees on the part of the House desire the concurrent resolution in order to straighten out that situation and make sure that there will not be a duplication of the appropriation.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has given notice from time to time of his desire to have the Senate proceed to the consideration of certain treaties on the Executive Calendar. In order that opportunity may be afforded, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am quite in accord with the request of the Senator from Arkansas. However, I should like to have an understanding at this point, in view of the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], that the unfinished business be not proceeded with until tomorrow.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. In all probability the consideration of the treaties will require the remainder of the afternoon, and I think it would be impracticable to proceed today with the bill which is the unfinished business.

Mr. McNARY. That is satisfactory.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REYNOLDS in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations in the Marine Corps which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BLACK, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Guy C. Reeve, of Florida, to be United States marshal, southern district of Florida, to succeed Charles N. Hildreth, Jr., resigned.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the calendar.

THOMAS D. SAMFORD

Mr. BLACK. From the Committee on the Judiciary, I report back favorably the nomination of Thomas D. Samford, of Alabama, to be United States attorney for the middle district of Alabama; and, because of the peculiar circumstances, I ask for the immediate consideration of the nomination. It will lead to no debate. The district attorney died last week. The grand jury was in session at the time of his death. There is a vacancy in the office; and for that reason I desire to ask immediate consideration of this nomination, which has been unanimously reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be read.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Thomas D. Samford, of Alabama, to be United States attorney, middle district of Alabama, to succeed Arthur B. Chilton, deceased.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the nomination? Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. BLACK. I ask that the President be notified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified.

If there are no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE AT ROME

The Senate as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider Executive C, Seventy-third Congress, second session, a protocol, signed at Rome on April 21, 1926, and effective on January 1, 1927, substituting new paragraphs for paragraphs 3 and 4 of article 10 of the convention of June 7, 1905, creating the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, which was read the second time, as follows:

PROTOCOL RELATIVE TO THE INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION OF SEPTEMBER–JUNE 1905

The undersigned, duly authorized by their respective Governments, have agreed as follows:

Paragraphs 3 and 4 of article 10 of the International Convention of June 7, 1905, for the creation of the International Agricultural Institute, shall be replaced by the following text:

"The amount of the contribution shall be fixed each year as follows: The number of the units of subscription is multiplied by the number of countries in each group. The total thus calculated gives the number of units by which the total expenditure authorized by the General Assembly shall be divided, reckoned in the currency of Italy, where the Institute has its headquarters, and after deducting the receipts other than the contributions of the States. The quotient gives the amount of the unit of subscription.

"In no case shall the contribution corresponding to each unit of subscription exceed the sum of 4,000 gold francs as a maximum.

"Contributions paid after the close of the financial year shall be deducted from the expenditure of the following year."

The present Protocol shall take effect on January 1, 1927.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, in proceeding with the consideration of this protocol, in the first place, I wish to have the message from the President and the letter of the Secretary of State read from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to adherence thereto by the Government of the United States, I transmit herewith a protocol, signed at Rome on April 21, 1926, and effective on January 1, 1927, substituting new paragraphs for paragraphs 3 and 4 of article 10 of the convention of June 7, 1905, creating the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome. I agree with the view of the Secretary of State, expressed in the accompanying report, that this Government should pay its full pro rata share of the expenses of the Institute and I trust that the Senate will view the matter in the same light and will authorize me to state the adherence of this Government to the protocol.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 19, 1934.

The PRESIDENT:

On April 21, 1926, there was signed for governments members of the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, a protocol substituting new paragraphs for paragraphs 3 and 4 of article 10 of the convention of June 7, 1905, by which the Institute was created. Although this Government was a party to the convention of 1905 and had actively supported the Institute from the time of its foundation, and although no objection was perceived to the provisions of the protocol, it was not signed on behalf of this Government. In 1926 difficulties had arisen between this Government and the Institute which eventually led to the withdrawal of the American member of the Permanent Committee and to a cessation of active American participation in the work of the Institute. During the period of nonparticipation, this Government refused to pay its contribution in accordance with the terms of the protocol, but continued to make the annual payment of 120,000 French francs in accordance with the obligations assumed under the convention.

The difficulties between this Government and the Institute were eventually removed by negotiation. During the present fiscal year the United States has made a contribution of 192,000 gold francs in accordance with the provisions of the protocol, and on August 14, 1933, we resumed our full collaboration with the Institute by the appointment of an American member of the Permanent Committee. It would, therefore, appear to be wise and equitable that the obligations of the Government of the United States toward the support of the Institute should henceforth be fixed and paid on the same basis as are those of the other member governments.

To this end the undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay the protocol before the President, and to recommend that, if his judgment approve thereof, it be transmitted to the Senate with a request that the Senate give its advice and consent to adherence thereto by the United States.

This recommendation is concurred in by the Secretary of Agriculture, who has stated to me in writing that it would be desirable to follow this procedure.

Respectfully submitted.

CORDELL HULL.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 16, 1934.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Institute of Agriculture at Rome was established many years ago. It was really originated by a citizen of California, who took great interest in the development of agriculture. As is stated in the letter, there was some dispute over our contributions to the Institute. The real dispute arose over the difference in the exchange rate of the dollar and the Italian lira. The exchange was first placed on the basis of the franc; and then, as all the expenses were incurred in Italy, there was a difference in the exchange rate between the lira and the franc. It amounted practically to only a few dollars. As we have now paid up in accordance with all the rules applying to the other governments, and the protocol has been reported unanimously by the committee, I do not think any further explanation is needed; and I ask for a vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I remember the time the Institute was established. I remember especially the activities of Mr. David Lubin in connection with it. I understood that at that time the King of Italy had, at his own expense, constructed a magnificent building in Rome, called the "Temple of Agriculture", for the holding of the sessions of this International Institute. Is that building still maintained?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is still maintained. It houses the Institute. We dropped out of the Institute for a year on account of the difference between the exchange rates, but we are now back in it, and the Senate is asked to ratify the protocol providing the method of paying our contribution.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Institute a very excellent institution, and I shall be very glad to vote for the ratification of the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendment, the protocol will be reported to the Senate.

The protocol was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution of ratification will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved (two thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive C, Seventy-third Congress, second session, a protocol, signed at Rome on April 21, 1926, and effective on January 1, 1927, substituting new paragraphs for paragraphs 3 and 4 of article 10 of the convention of June 7, 1905, creating the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification. [Putting the question.] Two thirds of the Senators present concurring therein, the resolution is agreed to, and the protocol is ratified.

INTERNATIONAL TELECOMMUNICATION AND RADIO REGULATIONS

ARTICLE 9

Execution of the Convention and of the Regulations

§ 1. The contracting governments undertake to apply the provisions of the present Convention and of the Regulations accepted by them, in all the offices and in all the telecommunication stations established or operated by them, and which are open to the international service of public correspondence, to the broadcasting service, or to the special services governed by the Regulations.

§ 2. Moreover, they agree to take the steps necessary to enforce the provisions of the present Convention and of the Regulations which they accept, upon the private operating agencies recognized by them and upon the other operating agencies duly authorized to establish and operate telecommunications of the international service whether or not open to public correspondence.

Denunciation of the Convention by the Governments

§ 1. Each contracting government shall have the right to denounce the present Convention by a notification, addressed, through diplomatic channels, to the government of the country in which was held the conference of plenipotentiaries that has drawn up the present Convention, and announced by these governments to all the other contracting governments, likewise through diplomatic channels.

§ 2. This denunciation shall take effect at the expiration of the period of 1 year, beginning with the day on which the notification was received by the government of the country in which the last conference of plenipotentiaries was held. This effect shall apply only to the author of the denunciation; the Convention shall remain in force for the other contracting governments.

Denunciation of the Regulations by the Governments

§ 1. Each government shall have the right to terminate the obligation which it has undertaken to apply one of the sets of Regulations, by notifying its decision to the Bureau of the Union which shall inform thereof the other governments concerned. Such notification shall take effect at the expiration of the period of one year, beginning with the day on which it was received by the Bureau of the Union. This effect shall apply only to the author of the denunciation; the Regulations in question shall remain in force for the other governments.

§ 2. The provision of § 1 above shall not annul the obligation for the contracting governments to enforce at least one of the sets of Regulations, covered by article 2 of this Convention, taking into account the reservation contained in § 2 of the said article.

ARTICLE 12

Denunciation of the Convention and of the Regulations by Colonies, Protectorates, Overseas Territories, or Territories under Sovereignty, Authority, or Mandate of the Contracting Governments

§ 1. The application of the present Convention to a territory, by virtue of the provisions of § 1 or § 2 of article 5, may terminate at any time.

§ 2. The declarations of denunciation provided for in § 1 above shall be notified and announced according to the conditions stated in § 1 of article 10; they shall take effect according to the provisions of § 2 of the latter article.

§ 3. The application of one or more of the sets of Regulations to a territory, by virtue of the provisions of § 5 of article 5, may terminate at any time.

§ 4. The declarations of denunciation provided for in § 3 above shall be notified and announced in accordance with the provisions of § 1 of article 11 and shall take effect under the conditions set forth in the said paragraph.

ARTICLE 13

Special Arrangements

The contracting governments reserve the right, for themselves, for the private operating agencies recognized by them, and for other operating agencies duly authorized to that effect, to conclude special arrangements on service matters which do not concern the governments in general. However, such arrangements must remain within the terms of the Convention and of the Regulations annexed thereto, as regards interference which their application might be likely to cause with the services of other countries.

ARTICLE 14

Relations with Noncontracting Governments

§ 1. Each of the contracting governments reserves the right, for itself and for the private operating agencies which it recognizes, to determine the conditions under which it will admit telecommunications exchanged with a country which has not adhered to the present Convention or to the Regulations which contain the provisions relative to the telecommunications involved.

§ 2. If a telecommunication originating in a nonadhering country is accepted by an adhering country, it must be transmitted and, so far as it uses the channels of a country adhering to the Convention and to the respective Regulations, the mandatory provisions of the Convention and of the Regulations in question, as well as the normal rates, shall be applicable to it.

Arbitration

§ 1. In case of disagreement between two or more contracting governments concerning the execution of either the present Convention or the Regulations contemplated in article 2, the dispute, if it is not settled through diplomatic channels, shall be submitted to arbitration at the request of any one of the governments in disagreement.

§ 2. Unless the parties in disagreement agree to adopt a procedure already established by treaties concluded between them for the settlement of international disputes, or the procedure provided for in § 7 of this article, arbitrators shall be appointed in the following manner:

§ 3. (1) The parties shall decide, after mutual agreement, whether the arbitration is to be intrusted to individuals or to governments or administrations; failing an agreement on this matter, governments shall be resorted to.

(2) In case the arbitration is to be intrusted to individuals, the arbitrators must not be of the same nationality as any one of the parties concerned in the dispute.

(3) In case the arbitration is to be intrusted to governments or administrations, the latter must be chosen from among the parties adhering to the agreement, the application of which caused the dispute.

§ 4. The party appealing to arbitration shall be considered as the plaintiff. This party shall designate an arbitrator and notify the opposing party thereof. The defendant must then appoint a second arbitrator, within 2 months after the receipt of plaintiff's notification.

§ 5. If more than two parties are involved, each group of plaintiffs or of defendants shall appoint an arbitrator, observing the same procedure as in § 4.

§ 6. The two arbitrators thus appointed shall agree in designating an umpire who, if the arbitrators are individuals and not governments or administrations, must not be of the same nationality as either of them or either of the parties involved. Failing an agreement of the arbitrators as to the choice of the umpire, each arbitrator shall propose an umpire in no way concerned in the dispute. Lots shall then be drawn between the umpires proposed. The drawing of lots shall be done by the Bureau of the Union.

§ 7. Finally, the parties in dispute shall have the right to have their disagreement settled by a single arbitrator. In this case, either they shall agree on the choice of the arbitrator, or the latter shall be designated in conformity with the method indicated in § 6.

§ 8. The arbitrators shall be free to decide on the procedure to be followed.

§ 9. Each party shall bear the expense it shall have incurred in the investigation of the dispute. The cost of the arbitration shall be apportioned equally among the parties involved.

ARTICLE 16

International Consulting Committees

§ 1. Consulting committees may be formed for the purpose of studying questions relating to the telecommunication services.

§ 2. The number, composition, duties, and functioning of these committees are defined in the Regulations annexed to the present Convention.

ARTICLE 17

Bureau of the Union

§ 1. A central office, called the Bureau of the International Telecommunication Union, shall function under the conditions stated hereinafter:

§ 2. (1) In addition to the work and operations provided for by the various other articles of the Convention and of the Regulations, the Bureau of the Union shall be charged with:

(a) work preparatory to and following conferences, in which it shall be represented in an advisory capacity;

(b) providing, in cooperation with the organizing administration involved, the secretariat of conferences of the Union, as well as, when so requested or when so provided for by the Regulations annexed to the present Convention, the secretariat of meetings of committees appointed by the Union or placed under the auspices of the latter;

(c) issuing such publications as will be found generally useful between two conferences.

(2) On the basis of the documents put at its disposal and of the information which it may gather, it shall publish periodically a journal of information and documentation concerning telecommunications.

(3) It must also, at all times, hold itself at the disposal of the contracting governments to furnish them with such opinions and information as they may need on questions concerning international telecommunications, and which it is in a better position to have or to obtain than these governments.

(4) It shall prepare an annual report on its activities, which shall be communicated to all members of the Union. The operating account shall be submitted, for examination and approval, to the plenipotentiary or administrative conferences provided for in article 18 of the present Convention.

§ 3. (1) The general expenses of the Bureau of the Union must not exceed, per year, the amounts specified in the Regulations annexed to the present Convention. These general expenses shall not include:

(a) the expenses pertaining to the work of plenipotentiary or administrative conferences,

(b) the expenses pertaining to the work of duly created committees.

(2) The expenses pertaining to the plenipotentiary and administrative conferences shall be borne by all the governments participating therein, in proportion to the contribution which they pay for the operation of the Bureau of the Union, in accordance with the provisions of the following subparagraph (3).

The expenses pertaining to the meetings of the committees regularly created shall be borne in accordance with the provisions of the Regulations annexed to the present Convention.

(3) The receipts and expenses of the Bureau of the Union must be carried in two separate accounts, one for the telegraph and telephone services, the other for the radio service. The expenses pertaining to each of these two divisions shall be borne by the governments adhering to the corresponding Regulations. For the apportioning of these expenses, the adhering governments shall be divided into six classes, each contributing at the rate of a certain number of units, namely:

1st class: 25 units
2d class: 20 units
3d class: 15 units
4th class: 10 units
5th class: 5 units
6th class: 3 units

(4) Each government shall inform the Bureau of the Union, directly or through its administration, of the class in which its country is to be placed. This classification shall be communicated to the members of the Union.

(5) The amounts advanced by the government supervising the Bureau of the Union must be refunded by the debtor governments with the briefest possible delay, and, at the latest, at the end of the fourth month following the month during which the account was rendered. After this period, the amounts due shall bear interest, accruing to the creditor government, at the rate of six percent (6%) per annum, counting from the date of expiration of the above-mentioned period.

§ 4. The Bureau of the Union shall be placed under the high supervision of the Government of the Swiss Confederation which shall regulate its organization, supervise its finances, make the necessary advances, and audit the annual accounts.

CHAPTER II

§ 1. The provisions of the present Convention shall be subject to revision by conferences of plenipotentiaries of the contracting governments.

§ 2. Revision of the Convention shall be undertaken when it has been so decided by a preceding conference of plenipotentiaries, or when at least twenty contracting governments have so stated their desire to the government of the country in which the Bureau of the Union is located.

§ 3. The provisions of the Regulations annexed to this Convention shall be subject to revision by administrative conferences of delegates from the contracting governments which have approved the Regulations to be revised, each conference itself determining the place and time for the following meeting.

§ 4. Each administrative conference may permit the participation, in an advisory capacity, of private operating agencies recognized by the respective contracting governments.

ARTICLE 19

Change of Date of a Conference

§ 1. The time set for the meeting of a conference of plenipotentiaries or of an administrative conference may be advanced or postponed if request to this effect is made by at least ten of the contracting governments to the government of the country in which the Bureau of the Union is located, and if such proposal is agreed to by the majority of the contracting governments which shall have forwarded their opinion within the time indicated.

§ 2. The conference shall then be held in the country originally designated, if the government of that country consents. Otherwise, the contracting governments shall be consulted through the government of the country in which the Bureau of the Union is located.

ARTICLE 20

Internal Regulations of the Conferences

§ 1. Before any other deliberation, each conference shall establish Internal Regulations containing the rules according to which the debates and the work shall be organized and conducted.

§ 2. For this purpose, the conference shall take as a basis the Internal Regulations of the preceding conference, which it may modify if deemed advisable.

ARTICLE 21

Language

§1. The language used in drafting the acts of the conferences and for all the documents of the Union, shall be French.

§2. (1) In the discussions of conferences, the French and English languages shall be permitted.

(2) Speeches made in French shall immediately be translated into English, and vice versa, by official interpreters of the Bureau of the Union.

(3) Other languages may also be used in the discussions of the conferences, on condition that the delegates using them provide for the translation of their own speeches into French or into English.

(4) Likewise these delegates may, if they so desire, have speeches in French or in English translated into their own language.

§ 1. The contracting governments, in agreement with the other contracting governments concerned, shall establish, under the best technical conditions, the channels and installations necessary to carry on the rapid and uninterrupted exchange of telecommunications in the international service.

§ 2. So far as possible, these channels and installations must be operated by the best methods and procedures which the practice of the service shall have made known; they must be maintained constantly in operating condition and kept abreast of scientific and technical progress.

§ 3. The contracting governments shall insure the protection of these channels and installations within the limits of their respective action.

§ 4. Unless other conditions are laid down by special arrangements, each contracting government shall, at its own expense, establish and maintain the sections of international conductors included within the limits of the territory of its country.

Stoppage of Telecommunications

§ 1. The contracting governments reserve the right to stop the transmission of any private telegram or radiotelegram which might appear dangerous to the safety of the state or contrary to the laws of the country, to public order, or to decency, provided that they immediately notify the office of origin of the stoppage of the said communication or of any part thereof, except when it might appear dangerous to the safety of the state to issue such notice.

§ 2. The contracting governments likewise reserve the right to interrupt any private telephone communication which might appear dangerous to the safety of the state or contrary to the laws of the country, to public order, or to decency.

ARTICLE 27

Suspension of Service

Each contracting government reserves the right to suspend the service of international telecommunication for an indefinite time if it deems necessary, either generally or only as regards certain connections and/or certain classes of communications, provided that it immediately so advise each of the other contracting governments, through the intermediary of the Bureau of the Union.

ARTICLE 28

The contracting governments must account to one another for the charges collected by their respective services.

CHAPTER IV

SPECIAL PROVISIONS FOR RADIO

ARTICLE 34

Intercommunication

§ 1. Stations carrying on radio communications in the mobile service shall be bound, within the scope of their normal operation, to exchange radio communications with one another irrespective of the radio system they have adopted.

§ 2. In order not to hinder scientific progress, however, the provisions of the preceding paragraph shall not prevent the use of a radio system incapable of communicating with other systems provided that this inability is due to the specific nature of the system and that it is not the result of devices adopted solely for the purpose of preventing intercommunication.

Interference

§ 1. All stations, regardless of their purpose, must, so far as possible, be established and operated in such a manner as not to interfere with the radio services or communications of either the other contracting governments, or the private operating agencies recognized by these contracting governments and of other duly authorized operating agencies which carry on radio-communication service.

§ 2. Each contracting government which does not operate the radio facilities itself undertakes to require the private operating agencies recognized by it and the other operating agencies duly authorized for this purpose, to observe the provisions of § 1 above.

ARTICLE 36

Distress Calls and Messages

Stations participating in the mobile service shall be obliged to accept, with absolute priority, distress calls and messages regardless of their origin, to reply in the same manner to such messages, and immediately to take such action in regard thereto as they may require.

ARTICLE 37

False or Deceptive Distress Signals—Irregular Use of Call Signals

The contracting governments agree to take the steps required to prevent the transmission or the putting into circulation of false or deceptive distress signals or distress calls, and the use, by a station, of call signals which have not been regularly assigned to it.

ARTICLE 38

Limited Service

Notwithstanding the provisions of § 1 of article 34, a station may be assigned to a limited international telecommunication service, determined by the purpose of such telecommunication or by other circumstances independent of the system.

ARTICLE 39

Installations of National Defense Services

§ 1. The contracting governments retain their full freedom in regard to radio installations not covered by article 9 and, particularly, the military stations of land, maritime, or air forces.

§ 2. (1) However, these installations and stations must, so far as possible, comply with the regulatory provisions concerning aid to be rendered in case of distress and measures to be taken to avoid interference. They must also, to the extent possible, comply with the regulatory provisions concerning the types of waves and the frequencies to be used, according to the nature of the service performed by the said services.

(2) Moreover, when these installations and stations exchange public correspondence or engage in the special services governed by the Regulations annexed to the present Convention, they must, in general, comply with the regulatory provisions for the conduct of such services.

[28] Visual broadcasting service: A service carrying on the broadcasting of visual images, either fixed or moving, primarily intended to be received by the general public.

ARTICLE 2

Secrecy of Radio Communications

[29] The administrations agree to take the necessary measures to prohibit and prevent:
[30] (a) the unauthorized interception of radio communications not intended for the general use of the public;
[31] (b) the divulging of the contents or of the mere existence, the publication or use, without authorization, of radio communications which may have been intercepted intentionally or otherwise.

ARTICLE 3

License

[32] § 1. (1) No transmitting station may be established or operated by any person or by any enterprise whatever without a special license issued by the government of the country to which the station in question is subject.
[33] (2) Mobile stations having their port of registry in a colony, a territory under sovereignty or mandate, an overseas territory, or a protectorate, may be considered as being subject to the authority of this colony, these territories, or this protectorate, so far as concerns the granting of licenses.
[34] § 2. The holder of a license shall be bound to preserve the secrecy of telecommunications, as provided for in article 24 of the Convention. In addition, the license must state that it is prohibited to receive radio correspondence other than that which the station is authorized to receive, and that, in case such correspondence is received involuntarily, it must neither be reproduced nor communicated to third persons, nor used for any purpose whatever, and that the very existence thereof must not be revealed.
[35] § 3. In order to facilitate the verification of licenses issued to mobile stations, it is recommended that there be added, when necessary, to the text drafted in the national language, a translation of this text into a language in general use in international relations.
[36] § 4. The government issuing the license to a mobile station shall mention therein the category to which this station belongs from the standpoint of international public correspondence.

ARTICLE 4

Choice of Apparatus

[37] § 1. The choice of radio apparatus and devices to be used in a station shall be unrestricted, provided that the waves emitted satisfy the provisions of the present Regulations.
[38] § 2. However, within limits compatible with economic requirements, the choice of transmitting, receiving, and measuring apparatus must be guided by the most recent technical progress as shown, notably, in the Opinions of the C.C.I.R.

ARTICLE 5

Classification of Emissions

[39] § 1. Emissions shall be divided into two classes:

A. Continuous waves,
B. Damped waves,

defined as follows:
[40] Class A: Waves the successive oscillations of which are identical under fixed conditions.
[41] Class B: Waves composed of successive series of oscillations the amplitude of which, after attaining a maximum, decreases gradually.
[42] § 2. The following types of waves are derived from Class A waves:
[43] Type A1: Continuous waves the amplitude or frequency of which varies under the effect of telegraph keying.
[44] Type A2: Continuous waves the amplitude or frequency of which varies according to a periodic audiofrequency law, combined with telegraph keying.
[45] Type A3: Continuous waves the amplitude or frequency of which varies according to a complex and variable audiofrequency law. An example of this type is radiotelephony.
[46] Type A4: Continuous waves the amplitude or frequency of which varies according to any law of frequencies greater than audible frequencies. An example of this type is television.
[47] § 3. The foregoing classification into waves of types A1, A2, A3, and A4 shall not prevent the use, under conditions fixed by the administrations concerned, of waves modulated or keyed by methods not included in the definitions of types A1, A2, A3, and A4.

[48] § 4. These definitions shall not relate to systems of transmitting apparatus.

[49] § 5. Waves shall be indicated first by their frequency in kilocycles per second (kc). Following this indication there shall be indicated, in parentheses, the approximate length in meters. In the present Regulations, the approximate value of the wave length in meters is the quotient of the number 300,000 divided by the frequency expressed in kilocycles per second.

ARTICLE 6

Quality of Emissions

[50] § 1. The waves emitted by a station must be kept on the authorized frequency as exactly as the state of the art permits, and their radiation must be as free as practically possible from all emissions not essential to the type of communication carried on.

[51] § 2. (1) The administrations shall, for the various cases of operation, determine the characteristics relative to the quality of the emissions, notably the accuracy and stability of frequency of the emitted wave, the level of harmonics, the width of the total frequency band occupied, etc., so that they will be in accord with technical progress.

[52] (2) The administrations agree to consider the tables (appendix 1: Table of Frequency Tolerances and of Instabilities; appendix 2: Table of Frequency Band Widths Occupied by the Emissions) as a guide indicating for the various cases, the limits to be observed to the extent possible.

[53] (3) Concerning the widths of frequency bands occupied by emissions, in practice the following conditions must be taken into account:

1. Width of the band as shown in appendix 2.
2. Variation of the frequency of the carrier wave.
3. Other technical conditions, such as the technical possibilities with regard to the form of filter circuit characteristics, both for transmitters and for receivers.

[54] § 3. (1) The administrations shall frequently check the waves emitted by the stations under their jurisdiction to determine whether or not they comply with the provisions of the present Regulations.

[55] (2) Effort shall be made to obtain international cooperation in this matter.

[56] § 4. In order to reduce interference in the frequency bands above 6,000 kc (wavelengths below 50 m), the use of directive antenna systems is recommended when such use is compatible with the nature of the service.

ARTICLE 7

Allocation and Use of Frequencies (Wavelengths) and of Types of Emission [57] § 1. Subject to the provisions of subparagraph (5) of § 5 below, the administrations of the contracting countries may assign any frequency and any type of wave to any radio station under their jurisdiction on the sole condition that no interference with any service of another country will result therefrom.

[58] § 2. The administrations, however, agree to assign to stations which by their very nature are capable of causing serious international interference, frequencies and types of waves in conformity with the rules for allocation and use of waves, as set forth below.

[59] § 3. The administrations also agree to assign frequencies to these stations, according to the kind of service they perform, in conformity with the table of allocation of frequencies (see table below).

[60] § 4. In the case where bands of frequencies are assigned to a specific service, the stations of that service must use frequencies sufficiently separated from the limits of these bands so as not to produce harmful interference with the operation of stations belonging to services to which the frequency bands immediately adjoining have been assigned.

[61] § 5. (1) The frequencies assigned by administrations to all fixed, land, and broadcasting stations, as well as the upper limit of power contemplated, must be notified to the Bureau of the Union with a view to their publication, when the stations in question carry on a regular service and are capable of causing international interference. Frequencies on which a coast station receives in carrying on a particular service with ship stations using stabilized transmitters must also be notified to the Bureau of the Union with a view to their publication. Frequencies must be selected in such a way as to avoid, so far as possible, interfering with international services belonging to the contracting countries and operated by existing stations, of which the frequencies have already been notified to the Bureau of the Union. The aforesaid notification must be made in accordance with the provisions of article 15, § 1 (b) and appendix 6 before the frequency is put into service and sufficiently in advance thereof to allow administrations to take any action which they may deem necessary to insure the efficient operation of their services.

[62] (2) (a) However, when the frequency which an administration intends to assign to a station is outside the bands authorized by the present Regulations for the service involved, this administration shall, in a special report, make the notification mentioned in the preceding subparagraph at least 6 months before this frequency is put into service, and in urgent cases, at least 3 months before that date.

[63] (b) The notification procedure laid down above shall also be observed when an administration intends to increase or to authorize the increase of the power or a change in the conditions of radiation of a station already operating outside the authorized bands, even if the frequency used is to remain the same.

[64] (c) With regard to stations which, when the present Regulations go into force, are already operating outside the bands authorized therein, the frequency and the power used shall be notified immediately to the Bureau of the Union, with a view to their publication, if such a notification has not been made previously.

[65] (3) (a) The administrations concerned shall conclude agreements, when needed, for determining the waves to be assigned to the stations in question, as well as for laying down the conditions of use of the waves thus assigned.

[66] (b) The administrations of any region may, in accordance with article 13 of the Convention, conclude regional arrangements regarding the allocation either of frequency bands to the services of the participating countries, or of frequencies to stations of these countries, and concerning the conditions for the use of the waves so assigned. The provisions of § 1 and those of § 5 (1) and (2) shall also apply to any arrangement of this nature.

[67] (4) The administrations concerned shall conclude the necessary agreements to avoid interference and, when needed, shall, for this purpose, in conformity with the procedure which will be agreed among them in bilateral or regional agreements, call upon organs of expert investigation or of expert investigation and concilation. If no agreement can be reached with regard to avoiding interference, the provisions of article 15 of the Convention can be applied.

[68] (5) (a) With regard to European broadcasting and subject to any right to which the extra-European administrations might be entitled by virtue of the present Regulations, the detailed provisions below, which can be abrogated or changed by agreement among the European administrations and which in no way change the provisions of subparagraph (2) above, shall be brought to bear in applying the principle laid down in § 1.

[70] (c) An administration wishing to establish such a service or to obtain a change in the conditions laid down by a previous agreement with regard to such a service (frequency, power, geographic position, etc.) shall submit the request to the European administrations through the Bureau of the Union. Any administration which does not answer within 6 weeks after the receipt of the said communication shall be considered as having given its assent.

[71] (d) It is fully understood that such a preliminary agreement shall also be necessary whenever, in a European broadcasting station, operating outside the authorized frequency bands, a change is made in the characteristics previously reported to the Bureau of the Union, and when such change is capable of affecting the condition of international interference.

[72] § 6. (1) In principle, the power of broadcasting stations must not exceed the value necessary to insure economically an effective high-quality national service within the limits of the country considered.

[73] (2) In principle, the location of powerful broadcasting stations, and especially of those which operate near the limits of the frequency bands reserved to broadcasting, must be chosen in such a way as to avoid, so far as possible, interference caused to the broadcasting services of other countries or to other services operating on neighboring frequencies.

[75] * Definition of the European region: The European region is limited on the north and west by the natural boundaries of Europe, on the east by the meridian 40° East of Greenwich and on the south by the parallel 30° North, so as to include the western part of the U.S.S.R. and the territories bordering on the Mediterranean, except the parts of Arabia and Hejaz which are included in this sector.

[76] [1] The wave of 143 kc (2,100 m) is the calling-wave of mobile stations using continuous long waves.

[77] [2] The European administrations shall arrange among themselves for placing in the band 240 to 265 kc (1,250 to 1,132 m) broadcasting stations which, by reason of their geographical position, will not interfere with services not open to public correspondence or with aeronautical services. Furthermore, these services shall be organized in such a way as not to interfere with the reception of the broadcasting stations thus chosen, within the limits of the national territories of these stations.

[78] [3] Services open to public correspondence shall not be admitted in the bands allocated to broadcasting, between 160 and 265 kc (1,875 and 1,132 m), even under the terms of article 7, § 1.

[79] [4] The frequency band 160 to 265 kc (1,875 to 1,132 m) shall also be assigned to Australia and New Zealand for broadcasting, as a regional allocation. The administrations of these two countries agree to place stations transmitting in this band in such a way as to avoid interfering with other services in other regions.

[80] [5] A band 30 kc wide, included within the limits of 285 to 320 kc (1,053 to 938 m) shall be allocated in each region to radiobeacon services. In the European region, this band shall be reserved solely for maritime radiobeacons.

[81] [6] The wave of 333 kc (900 m) is an international calling wave for the aeronautical services.

[82] [7] The wave of 500 kc (600 m) is the international calling and distress wave. The use of this wave is defined in articles 19, 22, and 30.

[83] [8] The European administrations shall arrange among themselves to place in the band 540 to 550 kc (556 to 545 m) broadcasting stations which, by reason of their geographical position, will interfere neither with mobile services in the band 485 to 515 kc (619 to 583 m), nor with services not open to public correspondence in the band 515 to 550 kc (583 to 545 m).

[84] Furthermore, services not open to public correspondence shall organize in such a way as not to interfere with the reception of broadcasting stations thus chosen within the limits of the national territories of these stations.

[85] [9] Mobile services may use the band 550 to 1,300 kc (545 to 230.8 m) on condition that they do not interfere with the services of a country which uses this same band exclusively for broadcasting.

[86] [10] On the frequency of 1,364 kc (220 m), type B waves shall be forbidden between 18:00 and 23:00 o'clock, local time, in all the regions where their use might interfere with broadcasting. However, in the region of North America, type A1 waves only shall be authorized during these hours.

[87] [11] The frequency 1,650 kc (182 m) is a calling wave for the mobile radiotelephone service with low-power ship stations. This calling wave shall not be obligatory, and the date on which it shall become obligatory for each country shall be determined by internal regulation.

[88] [12] In principle, this frequency band shall be reserved for telephone service with low-power ship stations. The countries of Europe whose ships do not use this type of communication shall avoid, so far as possible, the use of telegraphy in this band in regions near those where this telephone service is carried on.

[89] [14] Within Europe, the frequency bands 1,530 to 1,630 kc and 1,670 to 1,715 kc (196.1 to 184 m and 179.6 to 174.9 m) may be used by short-distance fixed services, provided they do not interfere with mobile services.

[90] [13] No traffic may be carried on in the band 1,630 to 1,670 kc (184 to 179.6 m).

[91] Calling on the wave of 1,650 kc (182 m) shall not be obligatory; each country shall determine, by internal regulation, when it shall become effective.

[92] NOTE.—A European conference, which is to take place before the going into effect of the present Regulations, may, as an exception, decide on annexing to its protocol some of the derogations which it may decide to make in the regional bands and which it may deem necessary to show therein. Such derogations will be in addition to those which are already provided for in the above table.

[93] § 8. (1) The use of type-B waves shall be forbidden on all frequencies, except the following:

375 kc (800 m)
410 kc (730 m)
425 kc (705 m)
454 kc (660 m)
500 kc (600 m)
1,364 kc (220 m)[1]

[1] See footnote (10) to the allocation table.

[94] (2) No new installation of transmitters of type-B waves may be made on ships or aircraft, except when these transmitters, working at full power, use less than 300 watts measured at the input of the audiofrequency supply transformer.

[95] (3) The use of type-B waves on all frequencies shall be forbidden, beginning January 1, 1940, except for transmitters meeting the power requirements stated in subparagraph (2) above.

[96] (4) No new installation of type-B-wave transmitters may be made in a land or fixed station. The waves of this type shall be forbidden in all land stations beginning January 1, 1935.

[97] (5) The administrations shall endeavor to abandon type-B waves, other than the 500-kc (600-m) wave, as soon as possible.

[98] § 9. The use of type-A1 waves only shall be authorized between 100 and 160 kc (3,000 and 1,875 m); the only exception to this rule shall be for type-A2 waves which may be used in the band 100 to 125 kc (3,000 to 2,400 m) for time signals exclusively.

[99] § 10. In the band 460 to 550 kc (652 to 545 m) no type of emission capable of rendering inoperative the distress, alarm, safety, or urgent signals sent on 500 kc (600 m) shall be authorized.

[100] § 11. (1) In the band 325 to 345 kc (923 to 870 m), no type of emission capable of rendering inoperative distress, safety, or urgent signals shall be authorized.

[101] (2) This rule shall not apply to regions in which special agreements provide otherwise.

[103] (2) A station shall not be permitted to use a frequency other than that allocated as stated above, for a service between fixed points.

[104] § 13. In principle, the stations shall use the same frequencies and the same types of emission for the transmission of messages by the unilateral method as for their normal service. Regional arrangements may, however, be made for the purpose of exempting the stations concerned from complying with this rule.

[105] § 14. A fixed station may, as secondary service, on its normal working frequency, make transmissions intended for mobile stations on the following conditions:

[106] (a) that the administrations concerned deem it necessary to use this exceptional working method;

[107] (b) that no increase in interference results therefrom.

[108] § 15. In order to facilitate the exchange of synoptic meteorological messages in the European regions, the frequencies of 41.6 kc and 89.5 kc (7,210 m and 3,352 m) shall be allocated to this service.

[109] § 16. To facilitate rapid transmission and distribution of information of value in the detection of crime and pursuit of criminals, a frequency between 37.5 and 100 kc (between 8,000 and 3,000 m) shall be reserved for this purpose by regional arrangements.

[110] § 17. Each administration may allocate to amateur stations frequency bands in accordance with the allocation table (§ 7 above).

[111] § 18. In order to decrease interference in the frequency bands above 4,000 kc (wavelengths below 75 m), used by the mobile service, and particularly in order to avoid interfering with the long-distance telephone communications of this service, the administrations agree to adopt the following rules, wherever possible, taking into account current engineering development:

[112] (1) (a) In the frequency bands above 5,500 kc (wavelengths below 54.55 m) allocated exclusively to the mobile service, the frequencies (wavelengths) which must be used by ship stations carrying on commercial service shall be on the low-frequency (longwave) side of the band, and especially in the limits of the harmonic bands enumerated below:

5,500 to 5,550 kc (54.55 to 54.05 m)
6,170 to 6,250 kc (48.62 to 48.00 m)
8,230 to 8,330 kc (36.45 to 36.01 m)
11,000 to 11,100 kc (27.27 to 27.03 m)
12,340 to 12,500 kc (24.31 to 24.00 m)
16,460 to 16,660 kc (18.23 to 18.01 m)
22,000 to 22,200 kc (13.64 to 13.51 m)

[113] NOTE.—The frequency bands 4,115 to 4,165 kc (72.90 to 72.03 m) may also be used by the stations mentioned above [see also (2) (c) below].

[114] (b) However, any commercial ship station the emissions of which comply with the frequency tolerances required of land stations under § 2 (2) of article 6, may transmit on the same freqency as the coast station with which it communicates.

[115] (c) When a communication for which no special arrangement has been made must be established between a ship station, on one hand, and another ship station or a coast station, on the other hand, the mobile station shall use one of the following frequencies situated approximately in the middle of the bands:

4,140 kc (72.46 m)
5,520 kc (54.35 m)
6,210 kc (48.31 m)
8,280 kc (36.23 m)
11,040 kc (27.17 m)
12,420 kc (24.15 m)
16,560 kc (18.12 m)
22,080 kc (13.59 m)

[116] NOTE.—The administrations agree, in reporting the frequency of a coast station, to indicate on which one of the waves specified in subparagraph (1) (c) listening will be carried on.

[117] (2) (a) Ship stations carrying on commercial service shall use the shared bands above 4,000 kc (wavelengths below 75 m) only when their emissions comply with the frequency tolerances specified for land stations in § 2 (2) of article 6. In this case, the frequencies used must be chosen on the higher-frequency (shorter-wave) side of the shared band and, more especially, in the limits of the harmonic bands enumerated below:

4,400 to 4,450 kc (68.18 to 67.42 m)
8,800 to 8,900 kc (34.09 to 33.71 m)
13,200 to 13,350 kc (22.73 to 22.47 m)
17,600 to 17,750 kc (17.05 to 16.90m)
22,900 to 23,000 kc (13.10 to 13.04 m)

[118] (b) Frequencies chosen in the portion of the band reserved to mobile services from 6,600 to 6,675 kc (45.45 to 44.94 m), in harmonic relation with the preceding bands, may also be used.

[119] (c) The provisions of subparagraph (2) (a) shall not apply to the portion of the shared band between 4,115 and 4,165 kc (72.90 and 72.03 m) which may be used by any ship station carrying on a commercial service.

[120] (3) In selecting frequencies for new fixed and coast stations, the administrations shall avoid using the frequencies in the bands specified in subparagraphs (1) (a), (2) (a), (2) (b), and (2) (c).

[121] § 19. (1) It is recognized that the frequencies between 6,000 and 30,000 kc (50 and 10 m) are very efficient for long-distance communications.

[122] (2) The administrations shall make the greatest possible effort to reserve the frequencies of this band for this purpose, except when their use for short- or medium-distance communication is not likely to interfere with long-distance communications.

[123] § 20. In Europe, Africa, and Asia, low-power directional radiobeacons the range of which does not exceed about 50 km may use any frequency in the band 1,500 to 3,500 kc (200 to 85.71 m) except the guard band of 1,630 to 1,670 kc (184 to 180 m) subject to agreements with the countries whose services are likely to be interfered with.

ARTICLE 8

Amateur Stations and Private Experimental Stations

[124] § 1. The exchange of communications between amateur stations and between private experimental stations of different countries shall be forbidden if the administration of one of the interested countries has given notice of its opposition to this exchange.

[125] § 2. (1) When this exchange is permitted, the communications must be carried on in plain language and be limited to messages relating to experiments and to remarks of a private nature for which, by reason of their lack of importance, the use of the telegraph service could not enter into consideration. It shall be strictly forbidden for owners of amateur stations to transmit international communications emanating from third persons.

[127] § 3. In amateur stations or in private experimental stations, authorized to conduct transmissions, any person operating the apparatus on his own account or for third persons must have proved that he is able to transmit texts in Morse code signals and to read, by aural radiotelegraph reception, texts so transmitted. He can be replaced only by authorized persons possessing the same qualifications.

[128] § 4. Administrations shall take such measures as they judge necessary to verify, from a technical standpoint, the qualifications of any person operating the apparatus.

[129] § 5. (1) The maximum power which amateur stations and private experimental stations may use shall be fixed by the interested administrations, taking account of the technical qualifications of the operators and of the conditions under which the said stations must work.

[130] (2) All the general rules laid down in the Convention and in the present Regulations shall apply to amateur stations and to private experimental stations. In particular, the frequency of the wave emitted must be as constant and as free from harmonics as the state of the art permits.

[131] (3) In the course of their emissions, these stations must, at short intervals, transmit their call signals or, in the case of experimental stations not yet provided with call signals, their names.

ARTICLE 9

Conditions to be Observed by Mobile Stations

A. GENERAL

[132] § 1. (1) Mobile stations must be established in such a way as to conform, as regards frequencies and types of waves, to the general provisions forming the subject of article 7.

[133] (2) In addition, no new type-B-wave transmitter installation shall be made in mobile stations, except when these transmitters, working at full power, use less than 300 watts measured at the input of the audiofrequency supply transformer.

[134] (3) Finally, the use of type-B waves on all frequencies shall be forbidden, beginning with January 1, 1940, except for transmitters fulfilling the same conditions as above regarding power.

[135] § 2. The frequency of emission of mobile stations shall be verified as often as possible by the inspection service to which they are subject.

[136] § 3. Receiving apparatus must be such that the current which they induce into the antenna shall be as low as possible and shall not disturb neighboring stations.

[137] § 4. Transmitting and receiving sets of any mobile station must permit of making frequency changes as rapidly as possible. All installations must be such that, after the communication is established, the time necessary to change from transmission to reception and vice versa shall be as short as possible.

B. SHIP STATIONS

[138] § 5. (1) The transmitting apparatus used in ship stations working on type-A2 or -B waves in the authorized band between 365 and 515 kc (822 and 583 m) must be provided with devices making it possible conveniently and appreciably to reduce the power thereof.

[139] (2) This provision shall not apply to transmitters in which the power, as measured at full load, does not exceed 300 watts on the transmitting-tube plates (type-A2 emission) or at the input of the audiofrequency supply transformers (type-B emission).

[140] (3) All ship stations transmitting on frequencies in the band 100 to 160 kc (3,000 to 1,875 m) and on frequencies above 4,000 kc (wavelengths below 75 m) must be equipped with a wave meter having a precision at least equal to 5/1000, or with an equivalent device.

[141] § 6. Any station installed on board a ship, compulsorily provided with radio apparatus as a result of an international agreement, must be able to transmit and to receive on the wave of 500 kc (600 m), type-A2 or -B and, in addition, on at least one other type-A2 or -B wave, in the authorized band between 365 and 485 kc (822 and 619 m).

[142] § 7. (1) In addition to the waves mentioned above, ship stations equipped to transmit type-A1, -A2, or -A3 waves may use the waves authorized in article 7.

[143] (2) The use of type-B waves shall be prohibited on all frequencies, except the following ones:

375 kc (800 m)
410 kc (730 m)
425 kc (705 m)
454 kc (660 m)
500 kc (600 m)
1,364 kc (220 m)[1]

[144] § 8. All the ship station apparatus installed for the transmission of type-A1 waves in the authorized band between 100 and 160 kc (3,000 and 1,875 m) must permit of using at least two frequencies, selected in this band, in addition to the frequency of 143 kc (2,100 m).

[145] § 9. (1) All stations on board ships compulsorily provided with radiotelegraph apparatus must be capable of receiving the wave of 500 kc (600 m) and, in addition, all the waves necessary to the operation of the service which they carry on.

[146] (2) These stations must be capable of receiving types A1 and A2 waves on the same frequencies easily and efficiently.

C. AIRCRAFT STATIONS

[147] § 10. (1) (a) Any station installed on board an aircraft flying over a maritime route, and compulsorily provided with radio apparatus as the result of an international agreement, must be capable of transmitting and receiving on the wave of 500 kc (600 m), type A2 or B.

[148] (b) As regards the restriction in the use of type-B waves, see B, § 7 (2) above.

[149] (2) (a) Any aircraft station must be capable of transmitting and receiving the wave of 333 kc (900 m), type A2 or A3.

[150] (b) This rule shall not apply to aircraft stations flying over regions where local agreements providing otherwise are in force.

ARTICLE 10

Operators' Certificates

A. GENERAL PROVISIONS

[151] § 1. (1) The service of every mobile radiotelegraph or radiotelephone station must be performed by a radiotelegraph operator holding a certificate issued by the government to which the station is subject. However, in mobile stations equipped with a low-power radio installation [power of the carrier wave in the antenna not exceeding 100 watts, except in the case of regional agreements provided for in § 7 (4)], and when this installation is used for telephony only, the service may be carried on by an operator holding a radiotelephone operator's certificate.

[152] (2) In case of absolute unavailability of the operator in the course of a crossing, flight, or voyage, the master or the person responsible for the mobile station may authorize, but only temporarily, an operator holding a certificate issued by another contracting government to carry on the radio service. When it becomes necessary to employ, as temporary operator, a person not holding an adequate certificate, this service must be limited to emergencies. In any case, the operator or the above-mentioned person must be replaced as soon as possible by an operator holding the certificate prescribed in § 1 (1) above.

[153] § 2. Each administration shall take the necessary measure to place operators under the obligation of observing the secrecy of correspondence and to prevent, to the greatest possible extent, the fraudulent use of these certificates.

[154] § 3. (1) There shall be two classes of certificates and a special certificate for radiotelegraph operators and two certificates for radiotelephone operators (general and limited).

[155] (2) The qualifications to be required for obtaining these certificates are contained in the following paragraphs; they shall be the minimum requirements.

[156] (3) Each government shall be free to fix the number of examinations deemed necessary to obtain the said certificates.

[157] (4) The holder of a first-class radiotelegraph operator's certificate, as well as the holder of a second-class radiotelegraph operator's certificate provided with a general radiotelephone operator's certificate may perform radiotelephone service on any mobile station. In the latter case, both the second-class radiotelegraph and radiotelephone operator's certificates can be combined.

B. FIRST-CLASS RADIOTELEGRAPH OPERATOR'S CERTIFICATE

[158] § 4. The first-class certificate shall be issued to operators who have shown that they possess the professional and technical qualifications enumerated below:

[159] (a) Knowledge of the general principles of electricity and of the theory of radiotelegraphy and radiotelephony, as well as the knowledge of the adjustment and of the practical operation of the types of apparatus used in the mobile service.

[160] (b) The theoretical and practical knowledge of the operation of the accessory apparatus, such as motor-generator sets, storage batteries, etc., used in the operation and adjustment of the apparatus specified in subparagraph (a).

[161] (c) The practical knowledge necessary to make, with the means on board, the repairs of damage which may have occurred to the apparatus during a voyage.

[162] (d) Ability to transmit correctly and to receive correctly by ear code groups (mixtures of letters, figures, and punctuation marks) at a speed of 20 (twenty) groups per minute, and of text in plain language, at a speed of 25 (twenty-five) words per minute. Each code group must contain 5 characters, each figure or punctuation mark counting as 2 characters. The average word of the text in plain language should contain 5 characters.

[164] (f) Detailed knowledge of the Regulations applying to the exchange of radio communications, knowledge of documents relative to charges for radio communications, knowledge of the radiotelegraph part of the Convention for the Safety of Life at Sea, and, in the case of aerial navigation, knowledge of the special provisions regulating the radio service of aerial navigation. In that case, the certificate shall stipulate that the holder has successfully passed the examinations dealing with these provisions.

[165] (g) Knowledge of the general geography of the world, particularly the principal navigation lines (maritime or aerial, according to the class of certificate) and the most important telecommunication channels.

C. SECOND-CLASS RADIOTELEGRAPH OPERATOR'S CERTIFICATE

[166] § 5. The second-class certificate shall be issued to operators who have shown that they possess the professional and technical qualifications enumerated below:

[167] (a) Elementary theoretical and practical knowledge of electricity and radiotelegraphy, as well as knowledge of the adjustment and practical operation of the types of apparatus used in the radiotelegraph mobile service.

[1] See note (30) to the frequency allocation table.

[168] (b) Elementary theoretical and practical knowledge of the operation of accessory apparatus, such as motor-generator sets, storage batteries, etc., used in the operation and adjustment of the apparatus mentioned in (a).
[169] (c) Practical knowledge sufficient for making minor repairs in case of damage to the apparatus.
[170] (d) Ability to transmit correctly and to receive correctly by ear code groups (mixtures of letters, figures, and punctuation marks) at a speed of 16 (sixteen) groups per minute. Each code group must contain 5 characters, each figure or punctuation mark counting as 2 characters.

In that case the certificate shall stipulate that the holder has successfully passed the examinations dealing with these provisions.
[172] (f) Knowledge of the general geography of the world, particularly the principal lines of navigation (maritime or aerial, according to the class of certificate) and the most important telecommunication channels.

D. SPECIAL RADIOTELEGRAPH OPERATOR'S CERTIFICATE

[173] § 6. (1) (a) The radiotelegraph service of ships, aircraft, and of all other vehicles for which a radiotelegraph installation is not required by international agreements may be carried on by operators holding a special radiotelegraph operator's certificate. This certificate shall be issued to operators capable of performing radio communications at the sending and receiving speed required for obtaining a second-class radiotelegraph operator's certificate.
[174] (b) It shall devolve upon each interested government to determine the other requirements for obtaining this certificate.
[175] (2) As an exception, the Government of New Zealand shall be permitted provisionally to issue a special certificate, for the granting of which it shall fix the requirements, to operators of small ships of its nationality which do not sail far from the coast of that country and which engage in the international service of public correspondence and in the general work of mobile stations only to a limited extent.

E. RADIOTELEPHONE OPERATOR'S CERTIFICATES

[176] § 7. (1) The general radiotelephone operator's certificate shall be issued to operators who have shown that they possess the professional knowledge and ability described below [see also § 3(4)]:
[177] (a) Practical knowledge of radiotelephony, especially with a view to avoiding interference.
[178] (b) Knowledge of the adjustment and operation of radiotelephone apparatus.
[179] (c) Ability to transmit and receive correctly by telephone.
[180] (d) Knowledge of the Regulations applying to the exchange of radiotelephone communications and of that part of the Radio Regulations which relates to safety of human life.
[181] (2) For the radiotelephone stations in which the power of the carrier wave in the antenna does not exceed 50 watts, each government concerned shall be permitted to determine the conditions for obtaining its own radiotelephone operator's certificate (limited radiotelephone operator's certificate).
[182] (3) A radiotelephone operator's certificate must show whether it is a general or limited certificate.
[183] (4) In order to cover special needs, regional agreements may determine the conditions to be fulfilled in order to obtain a radiotelephone operator's certificate, intended for use in radiotelephone stations fulfilling certain technical conditions and certain operating conditions. These conditions and agreements shall be stated in the papers issued to these operators. Such agreements shall be accepted provided the international services be not interfered with.
[184] (5) Radiotelephone operator's certificates already delivered to operators and complying with the conditions laid down in the General Regulations of Washington (1927) shall remain in force and be considered as general radiotelephone operator's certificates.

F. PROFESSIONAL GRADES

[185] § 8. (1) Before becoming chief operator in a station on board a ship of the first category (art. 23, § 3) a first-class operator must have had at least 1 year's experience as operator on board a ship or in a coast station.
[186] (2) In order to become chief operator in a station on board a ship of the second category (art. 23, § 3), a first-class operator must have had at least 6 months' experience as operator on board a ship or in a coast station.
[187] (3) (a) Operators holding a second-class certificate shall be authorized to embark as chief operators on ships of which the station belongs to the third category (art. 23 § 3).
[188] (b) After having shown 6 months' service on board a ship, they may embark as chief operators on ships of which the station belongs to the second category.
[189] (4) The government issuing a certificate can authorize an operator to perform service on board an aircraft only after this operator has fulfilled other conditions (for example: accomplished a certain number of flying hours in the aerial mobile service, etc.)

ARTICLE 11

Authority of the Master

[190] § 1. The radio service of a mobile station shall be placed under the supreme authority of the master or the person responsible for the ship, aircraft, or any other vehicle carrying the mobile station.
[191] § 2. The master or responsible person as well as any persons who may have knowledge of the text or simply the existence of radiotelegrams, or of any information acquired by means of the radio service, shall be bound by the obligation to observe and insure the secrecy of the correspondence.

Inspection of Stations

[192] § 1. (1) The competent governments or administrations of countries where a mobile station calls, may demand the production of the license. The operator of the mobile station or the person responsible for the station must submit to this verification. The license must be kept in such a way that it may be furnished without delay. However, the production of the license may be replaced by a permanent posting in the station, of a copy of the license certified by the authority which has granted it.
[193] (2) When the license cannot be produced or when manifest irregularities are detected, the governments or administrations may proceed to the inspection of radio installations in order to be assured that they satisfy the requirements of the present Regulations.
[194] (3) Moreover, the inspectors shall have the right to demand the production of the operators' certificates although no proof of professional qualifications may be demanded.
[195] § 2. (1) When a government or an administration has found it necessary to resort to the measures provided for in § 1 above, or when it has not been possible to produce the operators' certificates, it shall be necessary immediately to inform thereof the government or the administration to which the mobile station in question is subject. In addition, the procedure specified in article 13 shall be followed should necessity arise.
[196] (2) The official of the government or of the administration which has inspected the station must, before leaving the latter, communicate his findings to the commander or to the responsible person (art. 11) or to their substitute.
[197] § 3. As regards the technical and operating conditions which mobile stations holding a license must satisfy in the international radio-communication service, the contracting governments shall bind themselves not to impose upon foreign stations which are temporarily located in their territorial waters, or which may stop temporarily in their territory, conditions more stringent than those which are provided for in the present Regulations. These provisions shall in no way affect the provisions which, coming within the scope of international agreements relative to maritime or air navigation, are not determined in the present Regulations.

ARTICLE 13

Reporting of Violations

[198] § 1. Violations of the Convention or the Radio Regulations shall be reported by the stations detecting them to their administration by means of statements conforming to the model shown in appendix 3.

[199] § 2. In case of serious violations committed by a station, representations must be made to the administration of the country to which this station is subject.

[200] § 3. If an administration has knowledge of a violation of the Convention or of the Regulations, by a station which it has authorized, it shall ascertain the facts, determine the responsibility, and take the necessary action.

ARTICLE 14

Call Signals

[201] § 1. (1) All stations open to the international service of public correspondence, as well as private experimental stations, amateur stations, and private radio-communication stations, must have call signals from the international series assigned to each country in the following table. In this table, the first letter or the first two letters of the call signals show the nationality of the stations.

[202] (2) When a fixed station in the international service uses more than one frequency, each frequency shall be designated by a separate call signal used for that frequency only.

[205] (a) three letters, in the case of land stations;

[206] (b) three letters, or three letters followed by a single figure (other than 0 or 1), in the case of fixed stations;

[207] (c) four letters, in the case of ship stations;

[208] (d) five letters, in the case of aircraft stations;

[212] § 3. (1) In the aeronautical radio service, after communication has been established by means of the complete call signal [see § 2, (d) and (e)], the aircraft station may use an abbreviated call signal composed:

[213] (a) in radiotelegraphy, of the first and last letters of the complete 5-letter call signal;

[214] (b) in radiotelephony, of all or part of the name of the owner of the aircraft (company or individual) followed by the last two letters of the registration mark.

[215] (2) In the case of an aircraft performing a service which concerns the functioning of the League of Nations, the words "Société des Nations" shall replace the name of the owner of the aircraft.

[216] § 4. (1) The 26 letters of the alphabet, as well as the figures, in the cases provided for in § 2, may be used to form call signals; accented letters shall be excluded.

[217] (2) However, the following letter combinations may not be used for call signals:

[221] (d) combinations reserved for the abbreviations to be used in the radio service.

[222] § 5. (1) Each country shall choose call signals for its stations from the international series which is allocated to it and shall notify the Bureau of the Union of the call signals which it has assigned to its stations.

[223] (2) The Bureau of the Union shall see that the same call signal is not allocated more than once and that those call signals which might be confused with distress signals, or with other signals of a similar character, are not allocated.

ARTICLE 15

Service Documents

[224] § 1. The Bureau of the Union shall prepare and publish the following service documents:

[225] (a) The nomenclatures of all the land, mobile, and fixed stations having a call signal from the international series, whether or not open to public correspondense; the nomenclatures of the stations operating special services, broadcasting, and radio communications between fixed points.

[226] (b) The frequency list. This list shall give all the frequencies assigned to stations intended to carry on a regular service and which are capable of causing international interference.

[228] (d) A chart of coast stations open to public correspondence.

[229] (e) A table and a chart to be annexed to the nomenclature of coast and ship stations indicating the zones and hours of service of ships of which the stations belong to the second category (see appendices 4 and 5).

[230] (f) An alphabetical list of the call signals of the stations mentioned under (a) and provided with a call signal of the international series. This list shall be arranged without considering nationality. It shall be preceded by the call-signal-allocation table appearing in article 14.

[231] (g) General radio statistics.

[232] § 2. (1) The nomenclatures of stations [§ 1 (a)] shall be published in separate volumes as follows:

I. Nomenclature of Coast and Ship Stations.
II. Nomenclature of Aeronautical and Aircraft Stations.
III. Nomenclature of Stations Operating Special Services.
IV. Nomenclature of Fixed Stations (Index to the List of Frequencies for Fixed Stations in Service).
V. Nomenclature of Broadcasting Stations.

[223] (2) In the nomenclatures I, II, and III, each class of stations shall occupy a special section.

[234] § 3. The form for the different nomenclatures and for the frequency list is given in appendix 6. Detailed information concerning the preparation of these documents shall be given in the prefaces, in the headings of columns, and in the notes of the said documents.

[235] § 4. Once a month, by means of forms similar to those given in appendix 6, the administrations shall notify the Bureau of the Union of the additions, changes, and deletions to be made in the above-mentioned documents.

[236] § 5. (1) The nomenclature of coast and ship stations as well as the nomenclature of aeronautical and aircraft stations shall be reedited every 6 months without supplements between the two reeditions. As regards the nomenclature of stations operating special services and the nomenclature of broadcasting stations, the Bureau of the Union shall decide upon the intervals at which they must be reedited.

[237] (2) A recapitulative supplement shall be published every 3 months for the nomenclature of stations operating special services, and every 6 months for the nomenclature of broadcasting stations.

[238] (3) The frequency list and the nomenclature of fixed stations constituting an index to the frequency list, for fixed stations in service, shall be reedited separately each year. They shall be kept up to date by means of monthly supplements also edited separately.

[239] § 6. (1) The names of coast and aeronautical stations shall be followed respectively by the words RADIO and AERADIO.

[240] (2) The names of radio direction finding and of radio-beacon stations shall be followed respectively by the words GONIO and PHARE.

[241] § 7. Appendix 7 contains the symbols used in the documents to indicate the nature and the scope of the service of stations.

[242] § 8. The service documents with which mobile stations must be provided are listed in appendix 8.

ARTICLE 16

General Radiotelegraph Procedure in the Mobile Service[1][2]

[243] § 1. (1) In the mobile service, the following detailed procedure shall be obligatory except in the case of distress call or traffic to which the provisions of article 22 shall apply.

[244] (2) For the exchange of radio communications, stations of the mobile service shall use the abbreviations given in appendix 9.

[245] § 2. (1) Before transmitting, any station must make sure that it will not produce harmful interference with the transmissions being made within its range; if such interference is likely, the station shall await the first stop in the transmission which it may disturb.

[246] (2) If however, even after taking these precautions, the emissions of this station should cause interference with a radio transmission already in progress, the following rules shall be applied:

[247] (a) In the communication zone of a land station open to the public correspondence service or of any aeronautical station, the station whose emission produces the interference must cease transmitting at the first request of the above-mentioned land or aeronautical station.

[248] (b) In the case where a radio transmission already in progress between two ships happens to be interfered with by an emission from another ship, the latter must cease transmitting at the first request of either of the other two.

[249] (c) The station requesting this cessation must indicate the approximate length of the wait imposed upon the station whose emission it is suspending.

[250] § 3. Radiotelegrams of all kinds transmitted by ship stations shall be numbered in daily series, assigning number 1 to the first radiotelegram transmitted each day to each land station separately.

[251] § 4. CALLING A STATION AND SIGNALS PREPARATORY TO TRAFFIC

[252] (1) Method of calling

The call shall consist of the following:
not more than three times the call signal of the station called;
the word DE;
not more than three times the call signal of the calling station.

[253] (2) Wave to be used for the call and for preparatory signals

To make the call as well as to transmit preparatory signals the calling station shall use the wave on which the station called is listening.

[254] (3) Indication of the wave to be used for the traffic

[255] The call, as indicated in subparagraph (1) above, must be followed by the regulatory abbreviation indicating the frequency and/or the type of wave which the calling station proposes to use to transmit its traffic.

[256] When, as an exception to this rule, the call is not followed by the indication of the wave to be used for the traffic:

[257] (a) if the calling station is a land station:

it shall mean that this station proposes to use its normal working-wave, as indicated in the nomenclature, for the traffic.

[258] (b) if the calling station is a mobile station:

it shall mean that the wave to be used for the traffic is to be chosen by the station called.

[259] (4) Indication, when required, of the number of telegrams or of transmission by series

[260] When the calling station has more than one telegram to transmit to the station called, the preceding preparatory signals shall be followed by the regulatory abbreviation and by the figure specifying the number of these telegrams.

[261] Furthermore, when the calling station wishes to transmit these telegrams in series, it shall so indicate by adding the regulatory abbreviation requesting the consent of the station called.

[1] This procedure shall be applicable to short waves so far as possible.

[2] The provisions of §§ 2 and 8 shall be applicable to radiotelephone transmissions of the mobile service.

[262] § 5. REPLY TO CALLS AND SIGNALS PREPARATORY TO TRAFFIC

[263] (1) Method of reply to calls

The reply to calls shall consist of the following:

not more than three times the call signal of the calling station;

the word DE;

the call signal of the station called.

[264] (2) Wave for reply

[265] To transmit the reply to calls and to preparatory signals, the station called shall use the wave on which the calling station must listen.

[266] As an exception to this rule, when a mobile station calls a coast station on the wave 143 kc (2,100 m), the coast station shall transmit the reply to the calls on its normal working-wave of the bands between 100 and 160 kc (3,000 and 1,875 m), as indicated in the nomenclature.

[267] (3) Understanding as to the wave to be used for the traffic

[268] A. If the station called has an understanding with the calling station, it shall transmit:

(a) the reply to the call;

(b) the regulatory abbreviation indicating that from that time on it is listening on the frequency and/or the type of wave announced by the calling station;

(c) in some cases, the indications mentioned in subparagraph (4);

(d) the letter K, if the station called is ready to receive the traffic of the calling station;

(e) in certain cases, if it is useful, the regulatory abbreviation and the figure indicating the strength of the signals received. (See appendix 10.)

[269] B. If the station has no preliminary understanding, or if it must choose the wave to be used for the traffic, it shall transmit:

(a) the reply to the call;

(b) the regulatory abbreviation indicating the frequency and/or the type of wave requested; [2]

(c) in some cases, the indications mentioned in subparagraph (4).

[270] When an agreement is reached on the wave which the calling station must use for its traffic, the station called shall transmit the letter K after the indications contained in its reply.

[271] (4) Reply to the request for transmission by series

[272] The station called, replying to a calling station which has asked to transmit its telegrams in series [§ 4 (4)], shall indicate, by means of the regulatory abbreviation, whether it refuses or accepts and, in the latter case, if need be, shall specify the number of radiotelegrams which it is ready to receive in one series.

[273] (5) Difficulties in reception

[274] (a) If the station called is prevented from receiving, it shall reply to the call as indicated in subparagraph (3) above, but it shall replace the letter K by the signal . — . . . (wait), followed by a number indicating in minutes the probable duration of the wait. If this probable duration exceeds 10 minutes (5 minutes in the aeronautical mobile service), a reason must be given therefor.

[275] (b) When a station receives a call without being certain that this call is intended for it, it must not reply before the call has been repeated and understood. When, on the other hand, a station receives a call which is intended for it, but is doubtful about the call signal of the calling station, it must reply immediately, using the regulatory abbreviation instead of the call signal of the latter station.

[276] § 6. ROUTING OF TRAFFIC

[277] (1) Traffic wave

[278] (a) Each station of the mobile service shall transmit its traffic by using, in principle, one of its working-waves, as they are indicated in the nomenclature for the band in which the call was made.

[279] (b) Outside of its normal working-wave which is printed in boldface type in the nomenclature, each station may use additional waves of the same band, in accordance with the provisions of article 19 § 1 (10).

[280] (c) The use of calling waves for traffic shall be governed by article 19.

[282] (a) In principle, any radiotelegram containing more than 100 words shall be considered as forming a series or shall end a series in progress.

[283] (b) As a general rule, long radiotelegrams, both in plain language and in code or cipher language, shall be transmitted in sections, each section containing 50 words in case of plain language, and 20 words or groups in the case of code or cipher.

[284] (c) At the end of each section the signal . . — — . . (?) meaning "have you received the radiotelegram correctly up to this point?" shall be transmitted. If the section has been correctly received, the receiving station shall reply by the letter K and the transmission of the radiotelegram shall be continued.

[285] (3) Suspension of traffic

When a station of the mobile service transmits on a working wave of a land station and thus causes interference with the said land station, it must suspend its work at the request of the latter.

[286] §7. END OF TRAFFIC AND OF WORK

[287] (1) Signal for the end of transmission

[288] (a) The transmission of a radiotelegram shall be ended by the signal . — . — . (end of transmission), followed by the call signal of the transmitting station and the letter K.

[289] (b) In the case of transmission by series, the end of each radiotelegram shall be indicated by the signal . — . — . and the end of the series by the call signal of the transmitting station and the letter K.

[290] (2) Acknowledgment of receipt

[291] (a) The acknowledgment of receipt of a radiotelegram shall be given by transmitting the letter R, followed by the number of the radiotelegram; this acknowledgment of receipt shall be preceded by the following formula: call signal of the station which has transmitted, word DE, call signal of the station which has received.

[292] (b) The acknowledgment of receipt of a series of radiotelegrams shall be given by transmitting the letter R followed by the number of the last radiotelegram received. This acknowledgment of receipt shall be preceded by the above formula.

[293] (c) The acknowledgment of receipt shall be made by the receiving station on the same wave as for the reply to the call [see § 5 (2) above].

[295] (a) The end of work between two stations shall be indicated by each of them by means of the signal . . . — . — (end of work), followed by its own call signal.

[296] (b) For these signals the sending station shall continue to use the traffic wave and the receiving station the wave for the reply to the call.

[297] (c) The signal . . . — . — (end of work) shall also be used when the transmission of radiotelegrams of general information, meteorological information, and general safety warnings is ended and the transmission ends in the long-distance radio-communication service with deferred acknowledgment of receipt or without acknowledgement of receipt.

[298] § 8. DURATION OF WORK

[299] (1) (a) In no case, in the maritime mobile service, must the work on 500 kc (600 m) exceed 10 minutes.

[300] (b) In no case, in the aerial mobile service, must the work on 333 kc (900 m) exceed 5 minutes.

[301] (2) On frequencies other than those of 500 kc (600

[2] In the case where the choice of the wave to be used for the traffic falls to the station called, and if, in exceptional cases, the latter station does not give the corresponding indication, the traffic shall take place on the wave used for the call.

m) and 333 kc (900 m) the duration of the periods of work shall be determined;

[302] (a) between a land station and a mobile station, by the land station,

[304] § 9. TESTS

When it is necessary to make test signals, either for the adjustment of a transmitter before transmitting the call, or for the adjustment of a receiver, these signals must not last more than 10 seconds, and they must be composed of a series of V's followed by the call signal of the station transmitting for the tests.

ARTICLE 17

General call "to all"

[305] § 1. Two types of call signals "to all" shall be recognized:

1. the CQ call followed by the letter K (see §§ 2 and 3);

2. the CQ call not followed by the letter K (see § 4).

[306] § 2. Stations desiring to enter into communication with stations of the mobile service, without however, knowing the names of the mobile stations within their range, can use the inquiry signal CQ, in place of the call signal of the station called, in the calling formula, this formula being followed by the letter K (general call to all mobile stations, with request for reply).

[307] § 3. In regions where traffic is heavy, the use of the CQ call followed by the letter K shall be forbidden, except in combination with urgent signals.

[308] § 4. The CQ call not followed by the letter K (general call to all stations without request for reply) shall be used before transmission of information of all kinds intended to be read or used by anyone who can receive it.

ARTICLE 18

Calling

[309] § 1. (1) As a general rule, it shall devolve upon the mobile station to establish communication with the land station. It may call the land station for this purpose only after having arrived within the range of the latter.

[310] (2) However, a land station having traffic for a mobile station which has not indicated its presence may call the latter if it has reason to assume that the said mobile station is within its range and is listening.

[311] § 2. (1) Furthermore, land stations may transmit their calls in the form of "lists of calls" consisting of the call signals of all mobile stations for which they have traffic on hand, at definite intervals, at least 2 hours apart, which have been established by agreements between the governments concerned. Land stations which transmit their calls on the wave of 500 kc (600 m) shall transmit them in the form of "lists of calls", in alphabetical order, to include only the call signals of mobile stations for which they have traffic on hand and which are within their range. To their own call signal they shall add the abbreviations to indicate the working-wave they wish to use in the transmission. Land stations which use continuous waves outside of the band of 365 to 515 kc (822 to 583 m) shall transmit the call signals in the order which is most convenient for them.

[312] (2) The time at which land stations transmit their lists of calls, as well as the frequencies and types of waves which they use for this purpose must be indicated in the nomenclature.

[313] (3) Mobile stations which, during this transmission, hear their call signal, must answer as soon as they can, following, so far as possible, the order in which they were called.

[314] (4) When the traffic cannot be disposed of immediately, the land station shall inform each mobile station concerned of the probable time at which the work can begin, as well as the frequency and the type of wave which will be used in the work with it, if this is necessary.

[315] § 3. When a land station receives calls from several mobile stations at practically the same time, it shall decide as to the order in which these stations may transmit their traffic to it, its decision being based only on the necessity for permitting each calling station to exchange with it the greatest possible number of radiotelegrams.

[316] § 4. (1) When communication is first established with a land station, every mobile station, if it deems it advisable on account of possible confusion, can transmit its name spelled out as it appears in the nomenclature.

[317] (2) The land station can, by means of the abbreviation PTR, request the mobile station to give it the following information:

(a) approximate distance in nautical miles and bearing with reference to the land station, or else the position indicated by latitude and longitude;

(b) next port of call.

[318] (3) The information covered by subparagraph (2) shall be furnished by authorization of the commander or the person responsible for the vehicle carrying the mobile station and only in case it is requested by the land station.

[319] § 5. In communications between land stations and mobile stations, the mobile station shall comply with the instructions given by the land station, in all questions relative to the order and the time of transmission, to the choice of frequency (wave length) and/or of the type of wave and to the suspension of work. This provision shall not apply to cases of distress.

[320] § 6. In communications between mobile stations, and except for cases of distress, the station called shall control the work as indicated in § 5 above.

[321] § 7. (1) When a station called does not answer a call sent three times, at intervals of 2 minutes, the call must cease and it may be resumed only 15 minutes later (5 minutes for aeronautical mobile service). The calling station, before resuming the call, must make certain that the station called is not in communication with another station at that time.

[322] (2) The call may be repeated at shorter intervals if there is no danger that it will interfere with communications in progress.

[323] § 8. When the name and the address of the operating agency of a mobile station are not shown in the nomenclature or are no longer in accord with the data given therein, it shall devolve upon the mobile station, as a matter of routine, to furnish the land station to which it sends traffic with all the necessary information in this connection, using for this purpose the appropriate abbreviations.

ARTICLE 19

Use of Waves in the Mobile Service

[324] § 1. (1) In the bands included between 365 and 515 kc (822 and 583 m), the only type-B waves permissible shall be the following: 375, 410, 425, 454, and 500 kc (800, 730, 705, 660, and 600 m).

[325] (2) The general calling-wave which must be used by all ship stations and by all coast stations working in radiotelegraphy in the authorized bands between 365 and 515 kc (822 and 583 m), as well as by aircraft wishing to enter into communication with a coast station or a ship station, shall be the wave 500 kc (600 m) (A1, A2, or B).

[326] (3) The wave of 333 kc (900 m) shall be the international calling-wave for aerial services, except as indicated in article 9, §10 (2).

[327] (4) The wave of 143 kc (2,100 m) (Type-A1 only), shall be the international calling-wave for use in long-distance communications of the mobile service in the band 100 to 160 kc (3,000 to 1,875 m).

[328] (5) The wave of 500 kc (600 m) shall be the international distress wave; it shall be used for that purpose by ship stations and aircraft stations in requesting help from the maritime services. It may be used in a general way only for calls and replies as well as for distress traffic, urgent and safety messages, and signals.

[329] (6) However, on condition that the distress, urgent, safety, calling, and reply signals are not interfered with, the wave of 500 kc (600 m) may be used:

[330] (a) in the regions of heavy traffic for the transmission of a single short radiotelegram; [1]

[1] The regions of heavy traffic are indicated in the nomenclature of coast stations. These regions consist of the service areas of the coast stations indicated as not accepting traffic on 500 kc (600 m).

[331] (b) in other regions, for other purposes, but with discretion.

[332] (7) Besides the wave of 500 kc (600 m), the use of waves of all types between 485 and 515 kc (620 and 583 m) shall be forbidden.

[333] (8) Except for the wave of 143 kc (2,100 m) the use of any wave between 140 and 146 kc (2,143 and 2,055 m) shall be forbidden.

[334] (9) Coast and ship stations working within the authorized band between 365 and 515 kc (822 and 583 m) must be able to use at least one wave besides that of 500 kc (600 m); when an additional wave is printed in heavy type in the nomenclature, this is the normal working-wave of the station. The additional waves thus chosen for coast stations may or may not be the same as those of ship stations. In any case, the working-waves of coast stations must be chosen in such a way as to avoid interference with neighboring stations.

[335] (10) Besides their normal working-waves, printed in heavy type in the nomenclature, land and on-board stations may use, in the authorized bands, supplementary waves which shall be mentioned in the nomenclature in ordinary print. However, the band of frequencies from 365 to 385 kc (822 to 779 m) shall be reserved to the radio direction-finding service; it can be used by the mobile service, for radiotelegraph correspondence, only subject to the conditions set forth in article 7.

[336] (11) (a) The wave for the reply to a call transmitted on the general calling-wave [see § 1 (2)] shall be the wave of 500 kc (600 m), the same as that for calling.

[337] (b) The wave for the reply to a call, for aircraft stations and aeronautical stations working in the band 315 to 365 kc (952 to 822 m) shall be the wave of 333 kc (900 m), the same as that for calling.

[338] (c) The wave for the reply to a call transmitted on the international calling-wave of 143 kc (2,100 m) [see § 1 (4)] shall be:

the wave of 143 kc (2,100 m) for a mobile station;

the normal working-wave, for a coast station.

[339] § 2. (1) In order to increase safety of life at sea (ships), and over the sea (aircraft), all the stations of the maritime mobile service which normally listen on the waves of the authorized bands between 365 and 515 kc (822 and 583 m) must, during their working hours, make the necessary provisions to insure the watch on the distress wave [500 kc (600 m)] twice per hour, for 3 minutes, beginning at x:15 and at x:45 o'clock, Greenwich mean time.

[340] (2) During the intervals indicated above, outside the transmissions mentioned in article 22 (§§ 22 to 28):

[341] A. Transmissions must cease in the bands of 460 to 550 kc (652 to 545 m);

[342] B. Outside these bands:

(a) transmissions of type B waves shall be forbidden;

(b) other transmissions of the mobile service stations may continue; stations of the maritime mobile service may listen to these transmissions on the express condition that these stations shall first insure the watch on the distress wave, as provided for in subparagraph (1) of this paragraph.

[343] § 3. Since calls in the authorized bands between 365 and 515 kc (822 and 583 m) and from 315 to 365 kc (952 to 822 m) are normally made on the international calling-waves [§ 1 (2) and (3) above], mobile service stations open to the service of public correspondence and using waves from these bands for their work must, during their hours of watch, remain on watch on the calling-wave of their service. These stations, while observing the provisions of article 19, § 2 (1) and (2) and § 4 D, are authorized to abandon this watch only when they are engaged in a communication on other waves.

[344] § 4. The following rules must be followed in the operation of stations of the mobile service using type-A1 waves in the band 100 to 160 kc (3,000 to 1,875 m):

[345] A. (a) Any coast station carrying on a communication on one of these waves must listen on the wave of 143 kc (2,100 m), unless otherwise indicated in the nomenclature.

[346] (b) The coast station shall transmit all its traffic on the wave or on the waves which are specifically assigned to it.

[347] (c) A coast station to which one or more waves within the band 125 to 150 kc (2,400 to 2,000 m) have been allocated, shall have a prior right to this or these waves.

[348] (d) Any other mobile service station transmitting public traffic on this or these waves and thereby causing interference with the said coast station must discontinue its work at the request of the latter.

[349] B. (a) When a mobile station wishes to establish communication on one of these waves with another station of the mobile service, it must use the wave of 143 kc (2,100 m), unless otherwise indicated in the nomenclature.

[350] (b) This wave, designated as a general calling-wave, must be used exclusively in the North Atlantic:

1. for making individual calls and answering these calls;

2. for transmitting signals preliminary to the transmission of traffic.

[351] C. A mobile station, after having established communication with another station of the mobile service on the general calling-wave of 143 kc (2,100 m) must, so far as possible, transmit its traffic on some other wave of the authorized bands, provided it does not interfere with the work in progress of another station.

[352] D. As a general rule, any mobile station equipped for service on type-A1 waves in the band 100 to 160 kc (3,000 to 1,875) and which is not engaged in a communication on another wave, must, in order to permit the exchange of traffic with other stations of the mobile service, return each hour to the wave of 143 kc (2,100 m) for 5 minutes beginning at x:35 o'clock Greenwich mean time, during the specified hours, according to the category to which the station in question belongs.

[353] E. (a) Land stations must, so far as possible, transmit calls in the form of call lists; in this case, the stations shall transmit their call lists at specified hours published in the nomenclature, on the wave or waves allocated to them, in the band 100 to 160 kc (3,000 to 1,875 m), but not on the wave of 143 kc (2,100 m).

[354] (b) Land stations may, however, call mobile stations individually at any other time, outside the hours fixed for the transmission of call lists, according to circumstances or according to the work which they have to perform.

[355] (c) The wave of 143 kc (2,100 m) may be used for individual calls and shall preferably be used for this purpose during the period indicated in § 4, D.

[357] 1. For aircraft stations:

(a) In radiotelephony (calling and working) for aircraft of which the crew does not include a radiotelegraph operator.

(b) In radiotelegraphy on continuous waves for aircraft of which the crew includes a radiotelegraph operator.

Calling: type-A2 waves.

Working: type-A1 waves (type A2 shall be permitted in the case of work on short waves).

[358] 2. For aeronautical stations:

(a) In radiotelephony (calling and working) when the station must communicate with an aircraft of which the crew does not include a radiotelegraph operator.

(b) In radiotelegraphy, when the station must communicate with an aircraft of which the crew includes a radiotelegraph operator.

Type-A1 waves (calling and working).

Type-A2 waves shall be permitted (calling and working) in the case of short waves.

ARTICLE 20

Interference

[359] § 1. (1) The exchange of unnecessary signals or messages shall be forbidden to all stations.

[360] (2) Tests and experiments shall be permitted in mobile stations if they do not interfere with the service of other stations. As for stations other than mobile stations, each administration shall judge, before authorizing them, whether or not the proposed tests or experiments are likely to interfere with the service of other stations.

[361] § 2. It is recommended that traffic relating to public correspondence be transmitted on type-A1 waves rather than on type-A2 waves, and on type-2A waves rather than on type-B waves.

[362] § 3. All stations of the mobile service shall be required to exchange traffic with the minimum of radiated power necessary to insure good communication.

[363] § 4. Except in cases of distress, communications between on-board stations must not interfere with the work of land stations. When this work is thus interfered with, the on-board stations which cause it must stop transmitting or change wave, upon the first request of the land station concerned.

[364] § 5. Test and adjustment signals must be selected in such a way that there will result no confusion with a signal, an abbreviation, etc., having a particular meaning defined by these Regulations or by the International Code of Signals.

[365] § 6. (1) When it is necessary to transmit test or adjustment signals, and there is danger of interfering with the service of the adjoining land station, permission must be obtained from that land station before such transmissions are made.

[366] (2) Any station making transmissions for purposes of testing, adjusting, or experimenting, must transmit its call signal or, if need be, its name at frequent intervals in the course of these transmissions.

[367] § 7. The administration or enterprise which makes a complaint regarding interference must, to support and justify the complaint:

(a) specify the characteristics of the interference noted (frequency, variations in adjustment, call signal of the interfering station, etc.);

(b) state that the station interfered with actually uses the frequency assigned to it;

(c) state that it regularly uses receiving instruments of a type equivalent to the best used in the current practice of the service concerned.

[368] § 8. The administrations shall take the steps which they deem advisable and which are in keeping with their domestic legislation so that electrical apparatus capable of serious interference with an authorized radio service, will be used in such a manner as to avoid such interference.

ARTICLE 21

Emergency Installations

[369] § 1. The Convention for the Safety of Life at Sea shall determine which ships must be provided with emergency installations and shall define the conditions to be fulfilled by installations of this category.

[370] § 2. In the use of emergency installations, all the provisions of the present Regulations must be observed.

ARTICLE 22

Distress Traffic and Distress Signals—Alarm, Emergency, and Safety Signals

A. GENERAL

[371] § 1. No provision of these Regulations shall prevent a mobile station in distress from using any means available to it for drawing attention, signaling its position, and obtaining help.

[372] § 2. (1) When distress, emergency, or safety is involved, the telegraph transmission speed in general, must not exceed 16 words per minute.

[373] (2) The transmission speed for the alarm signal is indicated in § 21 (1).

B. WAVES TO BE USED IN CASE OF DISTRESS

[374] § 3. (1) Ships.—In case of distress, the wave to be used shall be the international distress wave, that is, 500 kc (600 m) (see art. 19); it must preferably be used in type A2 or B. Vessels which cannot transmit on the international distress wave shall use their normal calling-wave.

[375] (2) Aircraft.—Any aircraft in distress must transmit the distress call on the watching-wave of the fixed or mobile stations likely to help it: 500 kc (600 m) for stations of the maritime service, 333 kc (900 m) for stations of the aeronautical service [except as indicated in art. 9, § 10 (2)]. The waves to be used are type A2 or A3.

C. DISTRESS SIGNAL

[376] § 4. (1) In radiotelegraphy, the distress signal shall consist of the group . . . — — — . . .; in radiotelephony, the distress signal shall consist of the spoken expression MAY-DAY (corresponding to the French pronunciation of the expression "m'aider").

[377] (2) These distress signals shall announce that the ship, aircraft, or any other vehicle which sends the distress signal is threatened by serious and imminent danger and requests immediate assistance.

D. DISTRESS CALL

[378] § 5. (1) The distress call, when sent in radiotelegraphy on 500 kc (600 m) shall, as a general rule, be immediately preceded by the alarm signal as the latter is defined in § 21 (1).

[379] (2) When circumstances permit, the transmission of the call shall be separated from the end of the alarm signal by a 2-minute silence.

[380] (3) The distress call shall include:

the distress signal transmitted three times.
the word DE, and the call signal of the mobile station in distress transmitted three times.

[381] (4) This call shall have absolute priority over other transmissions. All stations hearing it must immediately cease all transmission capable of interfering with the distress traffic, and must listen on the wave used for the distress call. This call must not be sent to any particular station and does not require an acknowledgment of receipt.

E. DISTRESS MESSAGE

[382] § 6. (1) The distress call must be followed as soon as possible by the distress message. This message shall include the distress call followed by the name of the ship, aircraft, or the vehicle in distress, information regarding the position of the latter, the nature of the distress and the nature of the help requested, and any other further information which might facilitate this assistance.

[383] (2) When, after having sent its distress message, an aircraft is unable to signal its position, it shall endeavor to send its call signal long enough so that the radio direction-finding stations may determine its position.

[384] § 7. (1) As a general rule, a ship or aircraft at sea shall signal its position in latitude and longitude (Greenwich), using figures, for the degrees and minutes, accompanied by one of the words north or south and one of the words east or west. A period shall separate the degrees from the minutes. In some cases, the true bearings and the distance in nautical miles from some known geographical point may be given.

[385] (2) As a general rule, an aircraft flying over land shall signal its position by the name of the nearest locality, its approximate distance from this point, accompanied according to the case, by one of the words north, south, east, or west, or, in some cases, words indicating intermediate directions.

[386] § 8. The distress call and message shall be sent only by order of the master or person responsible for the ship, aircraft, or other vehicle carrying the mobile station.

[387] § 9. (1) The distress message must be repeated at intervals until an answer has been received, and especially during the periods of silence provided for in article 19, § 2.

[388] (2) The alarm signal may also be repeated, if necessary.

[389] (3) The intervals must, however, be sufficiently long so that stations preparing to reply may have time to put their transmitters in operation.

[390] (4) In case the on-board station in distress receives no answer to a distress message sent on the 500-kc (600-m) wave, the message may be repeated on any other available wave by means of which attention might be attracted.

[392] (a) when the station in distress is not itself in a position to transmit it;
[393] (b) when the master (or his relief) of the vessel, aircraft, or other vehicle carrying the station which intervenes, believes that further help is necessary.
[394] § 11. (1) Stations which receive a distress message from a mobile station which is unquestionably in their vicinity, must acknowledge receipt thereof at once (see §§ 18 and 19 below), taking care not to interfere with the transmission of the acknowledgment of receipt of the said message by other stations.
[395] (2) Stations which receive a distress message from a mobile station which unquestionably is not in their vicinity, must wait a short period of time before acknowledging receipt thereof, in order to make it possible for stations nearer to the mobile station in distress to answer and acknowledge receipt without interference.

F. DISTRESS TRAFFIC

[396] § 12. Distress traffic shall include all messages relative to immediate assistance needed by the mobile station in distress.
[397] § 13. Every distress traffic radiotelegram must include the distress signal transmitted at the beginning of the preamble.
[398] § 14. The control of distress traffic shall devolve upon the mobile station in distress or upon the mobile station which, by application of the provisions of § 10 (a), has sent the distress call. These stations may delegate the control of the distress traffic to another station.
[399] § 15. (1) When it considers it indispensable, any station of the mobile service in the proximity of the ship, aircraft, or vehicle in distress, may impose silence either to all the stations of the mobile service in the zone, or to any one station which may be causing interference with the distress traffic. In both cases, the regulatory abbreviation (QRT) shall be used, followed by the word DISTRESS; these indications shall be addressed "to all" stations or to one station only, as the case may be.
[400] (2) When the station in distress wishes to impose silence, it shall use the above-mentioned procedure, substituting the distress signal ...———... or the word DISTRESS.
[401] § 16. (1) Any station hearing a distress call must conform to the provisions of § 5 (4).
[402] (2) Any station of the mobile service which becomes aware of distress traffic must listen to this traffic even if it is not taking part in it.
[403] (3) For the entire duration of distress traffic, it shall be prohibited for all stations which are aware of this traffic and which are not taking part in it:
[404] (a) to use the distress wave [500 kc (600 m)] or the wave on which the distress traffic is taking place;
[405] (b) to use type-B waves.
[406] (4) A station of the mobile service which, while following distress traffic of which it is aware, is able to continue its normal service, may do so, when the distress traffic is well established, under the following conditions:
[407] (a) the use of the waves specified in (3) shall be forbidden;
[408] (b) the use of type-A1 waves, with the exception of those which might interfere with the distress traffic, shall be permitted;
[409] (c) it shall be allowed to use type-A2 or -A3 waves only in the band or bands allocated to the mobile service and which do not include frequencies used for distress traffic [the band around 500 kc (600 m) extends from 385 to 550 kc (779 to 545 m)].
[410] § 17. When it is no longer necessary to observe silence, or when the distress traffic is ended, the station which has controlled this traffic shall send on the distress wave, and, where necessary, on the wave used for this distress traffic, a message addressed "to all", indicating that the distress traffic is ended. This message shall take the following form:

CQ call "to all" (three times),
the word DE,
call signal of the station transmitting the message,
distress signal,
time of filing of the message, name and call signal of the mobile station which was in distress, words "distress traffic ended".

G. ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF RECEIPT OF A DISTRESS MESSAGE

[411] § 18. The acknowledgment of receipt of a distress message shall be given in the following form:

call signal of the mobile station in distress (three times),
the word DE,
call signal of the station acknowledging receipt (three times, group RRR,
distress signal.

[412] § 19. (1) Any mobile station acknowledging receipt of a distress message must, on the order of the master or his relief, give the following information as soon as possible, in the order indicated:

its name,
its position, in the form specified in § 7, the maximum speed at which it is proceeding towards the ship (aircraft or other vehicle) in distress.

[413] (2) Before transmitting this message the station must make sure that it is not interfering with the emissions of other stations in a better position to render immediate assistance to the station in distress.

H. REPETITION OF A DISTRESS CALL OR MESSAGE

[414] § 20. (1) Any station of the mobile service which is not in a position to render assistance and which has heard a distress message for which acknowledgment of receipt has not immediately been given, must take all possible steps to attract the attention of stations of the mobile service which are in a position to furnish help.
[415] (2) For this purpose, with the permission of the authority responsible for the station, the distress call or distress message may be repeated; this repetition shall be made at full power, either on the distress wave or on one of the waves which may be used in case of distress (§ 3 of this article); at the same time all necessary steps shall be taken to inform the authorities whose assistance may be advantageous.
[416] (3) A station which repeats a distress call or a distress message shall transmit after it the word DE followed by its own call signal three times.

I. AUTOMATIC ALARM SIGNAL

[417] § 21. (1) The alarm signal shall consist of a series of 12 dashes sent in 1 minute, the duration of each dash being 4 seconds and the duration of the interval between 2 dashes, 1 second. It can be transmitted by hand or by means of an automatic instrument.

[418] (2) The only purpose of this special signal is to set into operation the automatic apparatus used to give the alarm. It must only be used either to announce that a distress call or message is to follow, or to announce the transmission of an urgent cyclone warning; in the latter case it can only be used by coast stations duly authorized by their government.
[419] (3) In cases of distress, the use of the alarm signal is indicated in § 5 (1); in the case of urgent cyclone warnings, the emission of this warning must begin only 2 minutes after the end of the alarm signal.
[420] (4) The automatic instruments intended for the reception of the alarm signal must satisfy the following conditions:

1. they must be set into operation by the alarm signal even when numerous stations are working, and also when there is atmospheric interference;
2. they must not be made to operate by "atmospherics" or by powerful signals other than the alarm signal;
3. they must possess a sensitivity equal to that of a crystal-detector receiver connected to the same antenna;
4. they must give warning when their operation ceases to be normal.

[421] (5) Before an automatic alarm receiver may be approved for use on ships, the administration having jurisdiction must be satisfied by practical tests made under suitable conditions of interference, that the apparatus complies with the provisions of these Regulations.

[422] (6) The adoption of the type of alarm signal mentioned in (1) shall not prevent an administration from authorizing the use of an automatic instrument complying with the conditions set forth above and which would be operated by the distress signal . . . — — — . . .

J. URGENT SIGNAL

[423] § 22. (1) In radiotelegraphy, the urgent signal shall consist of the group XXX transmitted three times, with the letters of each group, as well as the consecutive groups well separated; it shall be sent before the call.

[424] (2) In radiotelephony the urgent signal shall consist of three transmissions of the expression PAN (corresponding to the French pronounciation of the word "panne"); it shall be transmitted before the call.[1]

[425] (3) The urgent signal shall indicate that the calling station has a very urgent message to transmit concerning the safety of a ship, an aircraft, or another vehicle, or concerning the safety of some person on board or sighted from on board.

[426] (4) In particular, an aircraft sending a message to indicate that it is in trouble and on the point of being forced to land (or to take to the sea), but that it is not in need of immediate help, shall send the urgent signal before its message.

[427] (5) The urgent signal sent by an aircraft and not followed by a message shall mean that the aircraft is forced to land (or to take to the sea), is not able to transmit a message, but is not in need of immediate help.

[428] (6) The urgent signal shall have priority over all other communications, except distress communications, and all mobile or land stations hearing it must take care not to interfere with the transmission of the message which follows the urgent signal.

[429] (7) In case the urgent signal is used by a mobile station, this signal must, as a general rule, be addressed to a definite station.

[430] § 23. When the urgent signal is used the messages which this signal precedes must, as a general rule, be written in plain language, except in the case of medical messages exchanged between ships or between a ship and a coast station.

[431] § 24. (1) Mobile stations hearing the urgent signal must listen for at least 3 minutes. After this interval, and if no urgent message has been heard, they may resume their normal service.

[432] (2) However, land and on-board stations which are in communication on waves other than that used for the transmission of the urgent signal and the call following it, may continue their normal work without interruption.

[433] § 25. (1) The urgent signal may be transmitted only with the authorization of the master or of the person responsible for the ship, aircraft, or any other vehicle carrying the mobile station.

[434] (2) In the case of a land station, the urgent signal may be transmitted only with the approval of the responsible authority.

K. SAFETY SIGNAL

[435] § 26. (1) In radiotelegraphy, the safety signal shall consist of the group TTT, transmitted three times, with the letters of each group, as well as the consecutive groups, well separated. This signal shall be followed by the word DE and three transmissions of the call signal of the station sending it. It announces that this station is about to transmit a message concerning the safety of navigation or giving important meteorological warnings.

[436] (2) In radiotelephony, the word SECURITY (corresponding to the French pronunciation of the word "sécurité") repeated three times, shall be used as the safety signal.

[437] § 27. The safety signal and the message which follows it shall be transmitted on the distress wave or on one of the waves which, in some instances, may be used in case of distress (see § 3 of this article.)

[438] § 28. (1) In the maritime mobile service, apart from messages transmitted according to a schedule, the safety signal must be transmitted toward the end of the first ensuing period of silence (art. 19, § 2), and the message shall be transmitted immediately after the period of silence; in the cases provided for in article 30, A, § 4 (3) and § 5 (1), B, § 7, the safety signal and the message which follows it must be transmitted with as little delay as possible, but must be repeated, as has just been indicated, at the first ensuing period of silence.

[439] (2) All stations hearing the safety signal must continue listening on the wave on which the safety signal has been sent until the message so announced has been completed; they must moreover keep silence on all waves likely to interfere with the message.

[440] (3) The foregoing rules shall be applicable to the aeronautical service so far as they are not in conflict with regional arrangements providing aerial navigation with at least equivalent protection.

ARTICLE 23

Working Hours of Stations of the Mobile Service

[441] § 1. In order to permit the application of the rules indicated below regarding the hours of watch, each wireless station must have an accurate clock and must take the necessary steps to see that it is correctly adjusted to Greenwich mean time.

A. LAND STATIONS

[442] § 2. (1) The service of land stations shall, so far as possible, be continuous (day and night). However, the duration of the service of certain land stations may be limited. Each administration or public enterprise duly authorized to this effect, shall determine the service hours of the land stations under its authority.

[443] (2) Land stations the service of which is not continuous may not close before having:

1. finished all operations called for by a distress call;
2. exchanged all radiotelegrams originating in or destined to the mobile stations which are within their range and have signaled their presence before the effective cessation of work.

[444] (3) The service of aeronautical stations shall be continuous during the entire period of flight in the sector or sectors of the course or courses for which the station in question carries on the radio service.

B. SHIP STATIONS

[445] § 3. (1) For the international service of public correspondence, ship stations shall be classified into three categories according to the internal regulations of the administration to which they are subject, as follows:

[446] stations of the first category: these stations shall carry on a continuous service;

[447] stations of the second category: these stations shall carry on a service of limited duration, as outlined in subparagraph (2) below;

[448] stations of the third category: these stations shall carry on a service of a more limited duration than that of the stations of the second category, or a service the duration of which is not determined by these Regulations.

[449] (2) (a) Ship stations classified in the second category must carry on their service at least during the period assigned to them in appendix 4. This period shall be mentioned in the license.

[450] (b) In the case of short crossings, they shall carry on the service during the hours determined by the administration to which they belong.

[451] (3) In certain cases, the service hours of stations on ships of the third category may be mentioned in the nomenclature.

[452] (4) As a general rule, when a coast station has traffic on hand for a station on a ship of the third category not having fixed listening hours and which is presumed to be within the range of the coast station, the latter shall call the ship station during the first half-hour of the first and third listening periods of ship stations of the second category carrying on an 8-hour service in accordance with the provisions of appendix 4.

[1] In the aeronautical service, at present, the signal PAN is also used as the radiotelegraph urgent signal; in this case the three letters must be well separated in order that the letters AN will not be changed into the letter P.

[453] § 4. (1) The provisions of § 2 (2) of this article shall apply strictly to ship stations with regard to the distress service, and, so far as possible, in conformity with the spirit of the contents of item 2 of the said subparagraph.

[454] (2) It shall devolve upon each of the contracting governments to insure the efficiency of the service in the ship stations of its nationality by requiring in these stations the presence of the necessary number of operators, taking into account its internal regulations on the subject.

C. AIRCRAFT STATIONS

[455] § 5. For the international service of public correspondence, aircraft stations shall be classified into two categories according to the internal regulations of the administrations to which they are subject, as follows:

[456] stations of the first category: these stations shall carry on a continuous service;

[457] stations of the second category: these stations shall carry on a limited service of which the duration is not determined by these Regulations.

D. GENERAL PROVISIONS

[458] § 6. (1) A mobile station which has no fixed working-hours must advise the land station with which it is in communication of the closing and reopening hours of its service.

[459] (2) (a) Every mobile station the service of which is about to close, due to arrival, must so advise the nearest land station and, if necessary, the other land stations with which it generally communicates. It must not close until it has cleared all traffic on hand.

[460] (b) At the time of its departure, it must advise the aforesaid land station or stations of its reopening.

E. CLASS AND MINIMUM NUMBER OF OPERATORS

[461] § 7. With respect to the international service of public correspondence of mobile stations, the personnel of these stations must include at least:

[462] 1. for ship stations of the first category; an operator holding a first-class radiotelegraph operator's certificate;

[463] 2. for ship stations of the second category; an operator holding a first- or second-class radiotelegraph operator's certificate;

[464] 3. (a) for ship stations of the third category, except in the cases provided for in subparagraphs (b) and (c) below, an operator having successfully passed the examination for a second-class radiotelegraph operator's certificate;

[465] (b) for ship stations of which radiotelegraph equipment is not made compulsory by international agreements, an operator holding a special certificate covering the conditions contained in article 10, D, § 6 (1);

[466] (c) for ship stations equipped with a low-power radiotelephone installation, an operator holding a radiotelephone operator's certificate covering the conditions contained in article 10, E, § 7;

[467] 4. (a) for aircraft stations, except in the cases provided for in subparagraphs (b) and (c) below, an operator holding a first- or second-class radiotelegraph operator's certificate, according to provisions of an internal character laid down by the governments to which these stations are subject;

[468] (b) for stations on board aircraft for which radiotelegraph equipment is not made compulsory by international agreements, an operator holding a special certificate covering the conditions contained in article 10, D, § 6 (1);

[469] (c) for stations on board aircraft equipped with a low-power radiotelephone installation, an operator holding a radiotelephone operator's certificate covering the conditions contained in article 10, E, § 7.

ARTICLE 24

Order of Priority of Communications in the Mobile Service

[470] The order of priority of radio communications in the mobile service shall be as follows:

1. distress calls, distress messages, and distress traffic;
2. communications preceded by an urgent signal;
3. communications preceded by a safety signal;
4. communications relative to radio direction-finding bearings;
5. government radiotelegrams for which priority right has not been waived;
6. all other communications.

ARTICLE 25

Indication of the Station of Origin of Radiotelegrams

[471] § 1. When the name of a station, due to similarity of names, is followed by the call signal of that station, that signal shall be separated from the name of the station by a fraction bar. Example: Oregon/OZOC (and not Oregonozoc); Rose/DDOR (and not Roseddor).

[472] § 2. When reforwarding, over the communication channels of the general network, a radiotelegram received from a mobile station, the land station shall transmit, as the origin, the name of the mobile station where the radiotelegram originated, as that name is shown in the nomenclature, followed by the name of the said land station.

[473] § 3. If it deems advisable, the land station may complete the indication of the mobile station of origin by the word "ship", or "aircraft", or "dirigible" placed before the name of the said station of origin, for the purpose of avoiding any confusion with a telegraph office or a fixed station having the same name.

Routing of Radiotelegrams

[474] § 1. (1) As a general rule, a mobile station using type -A2, -A3, or -B waves within the band 365 to 515 kc (822 to 583m) shall send its radiotelegrams to the nearest land station. In order to accelerate or facilitate the transmission of radiotelegrams, it may, however, transmit them to another mobile station. The latter shall treat radiotelegrams thus received like those filed in its own station. (See also art. 7 of the Additional Regulations.)

[475] (2) However, when the mobile station can choose among several land stations situated at approximately the same distance, it must give the preference to the station located on the territory of the country of destination or of normal transit of the radiotelegram. When the station chosen is not the nearest, the mobile station must cease working or change the type or frequency of emission upon the first request made by the land station of the service concerned which is actually the nearest, when this request is based upon the interference which the work in question causes to the latter.

[476] § 2. Mobile stations using either type -A1 waves or type-A2 or A3 waves, outside the band 365 to 515 kc (822 to 583 m) must, as a general rule, give preference to the land station located on the territory of the country of destination or of the country which it appears could most reasonably effect the transit of the radiotelegrams.

[477] § 3. If the sender of a radiotelegram filed in a mobile station has designated the land station to which he desires his radiotelegram sent, the mobile station must, in some cases, wait until the conditions specified in the preceding paragraphs are fulfilled, before making the transmission to the designated land station.

ARTICLE 27

Accounting for Radiotelegrams

A. ESTABLISHMENT OF ACCOUNTS

[478] § 1. In principle, land and on-board charges shall not enter into international telegraph accounts.

[479] § 2. Governments reserve the right to make different arrangements among themselves and with the private enterprises concerned, with a view to the adoption of other provisions for accounting, notably the adoption, so far as possible, of the system in which land and on-board charges follow radiotelegrams from country to country through the telegraph accounts.

[480] § 3. In the absence of a different arrangement, in accordance with the provisions of § 2 above, accounts for these charges shall be set up each month by the administrations to which the land stations are subject and sent by them to the administrations concerned.

[481] § 4. Where the land stations are not operated by the administration of the country, the operating agency may be substituted for the administration of the country, so far as accounts are concerned.

[482] § 5. For radiotelegrams originating with on-board stations, the administration to which the land station is subject shall debit the administration to which the on-board station of origin is subject with the land charges, the charges pertaining to the course on the general system of telecommunication channels—hereinafter called telegraph charges—the total charges collected for prepaid replies, land and telegraph charges collected for collating, charges collected for delivery by special messenger, mail or air mail, and charges collected for copies of multiple telegrams. For transmission over telegraph-communication channels, radiotelegrams shall be handled, from the standpoint of accounts, in accordance with the Telegraph Regulations.

[483] § 6. For radiotelegrams addressed to a country situated beyond the one to which the land station is subject, the telegraph charges to be settled in conformity with the above provisions shall be those resulting either from rate tables pertaining to the international telegraph correspondence, or from special arrangements concluded among administrations of bordering countries and published by these administrations, and not the charges which might be collected by applying either minimum charges per telegram, or methods for rounding off prices per telegram in any way whatever.

[484] § 7. For radiotelegrams addressed to on-board stations, the administration to which the office of origin is subject, shall be debited directly by that to which the land station is subject, with the land and on-board charges plus the land and on-board charges applicable for collating, but only in the case where the radiotelegram has been transmitted to the on-board station. However, in the case covered in § 4, article 9 of the Additional Regulations, the administration to which the office of origin is subject shall be debited with the land charge by the administration to which the land station is subject. The administration to which the office of origin is subject shall always be debited from country to country, if necessary, through the telegraph accounts, and by the administration to which the land station is subject, with the total charges appertaining to prepaid replies and with the telegraph charge pertaining to collating. Regarding telegraph charges, charges concerning delivery by mail or air mail, and charges for copies of multiple telegrams, the normal telegraph procedure shall be adopted, with respect to telegraph accounts. The administration to which the land station is subject shall, so far as the radiotelegram has been transmitted, credit the administration to which the on-board station of destination is subject: (a) with the on-board charge; (b) if necessary, with the charges accruing to intermediate on-board stations, with the total amount collected for prepaid replies, with the on-board charge paid for collating, with the charges collected for copies of multiple telegrams, and with the charges collected for mail or air mail delivery.

[485] § 8. In the mobile service accounts, paid service notices and replies to radiotelegrams with prepaid reply shall be handled in every respect like other radiotelegrams.

[486] § 9. For radiotelegrams exchanged between on-board stations—

[487] (a) through the intermediary of a single land station:

The administration to which the land station is subject shall debit the one to which the on-board station of origin is subject: with the land charge, with the territorial telegraph charge, if any, and with the charge of the on-board station of destination. It shall credit the administration to which the on-board station of destination is subject with the on-board charge accruing to that station.

[488] (b) through the intermediary of two land stations:

The administration to which the first land station is subject shall debit the one to which the on-board station of origin is subject, with all the charges collected, deduction being made of the charges accruing to this on-board station. The administration to which the second land station is subject shall debit directly the administration to which the first land station is subject, with the charges pertaining to transmission to the mobile station of destination, but only where this transmission has been made.

[489] § 10. For radiotelegrams which are routed, at the sender's request, through one or two intermediary on-board stations, each of these shall debit the on-board station of destination, in the case of a radiotelegram addressed to an on-board station, or the on-board station of origin when the radiotelegram originates with an on-board station, with the on-board charge accruing to it for transit.

B. EXCHANGE, VERIFICATION, AND SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS

[490] § 11. In principle, settlement of accounts pertaining to exchanges between on-board stations shall be made directly among the agencies operating these stations, the operating agency to which the station of origin is subject being debited by that to which the station of destination is subject.

[491] § 12. In principle, monthly accounts, serving as basis for the accounting of radiotelegrams, dealt with in this article, shall be set up, using so far as possible the model form shown in appendix 11, for each on-board station separately and according to the number of words per month in the radiotelegrams of the same origin and for the same destination, exchanged with the same land station. Accounts shall be sent within 3 months after the month to which they refer.

[492] § 13. Notice of acceptance of an account, or comments concerning it, shall be sent within 6 months from the date on which the latter is rendered.

[493] § 14. The periods mentioned in the two preceding paragraphs may exceed the time stipulated when exceptional difficulties arise in the postal transport of documents between land stations and the administrations to which they belong. Nevertheless, the closing and settlement of accounts presented more than 18 months after the date of the filing of the radiotelegrams, to which the accounts relate, may be refused by the debtor administration.

[494] § 15. In the absence of contrary arrangement, the following provisions shall be applicable to radiotelegraph accounts considered in the present article.

[495] § 16. (1) Monthly accounts shall be accepted without revision when the difference between the accounts prepared by the two administrations concerned does not exceed one percent (1%) of the account of the creditor administration, provided that the amount of this account be not greater than one hundred thousand francs (100,000 fr.); when the amount of the account drawn up by the creditor administration is greater than a hundred thousand francs (100,000 fr.), the difference must not exceed a total sum comprising:

1st. 1% of the first hundred thousand francs (100,000 fr.);

2d. 0.5% of the remainder of the amount of the account.

[496] However, if the difference does not exceed twenty-five francs (25 fr.), the discrepancy must be disregarded.

[497] (2) A revision once begun shall cease as soon as, following an exchange of comments between the two administrations concerned, the difference has been reduced to an amount not exceeding the maximum fixed by the first subparagraph of this paragraph.

[498] § 17. (1) Immediately after the acceptance of the accounts appertaining to the last month of a quarter, a quarterly account, setting forth the balance for the whole of the 3 months of the quarter, shall, in the absence of a contrary arrangement between the two administrations concerned, be prepared by the creditor administration and forwarded in duplicate to the debtor administration, which, after checking it, shall return one of the two copies endorsed with its acceptance.

[499] (2) Failing acceptance of one or the other of the monthly accounts of the same quarter before the expiration of the sixth month following the quarter to which the accounts refer, the quarterly account may, nevertheless, be prepared by the creditor administration for a provisional settlement, which shall become obligatory for the debtor administration in the conditions set forth in § 18 below. Corrections subsequently found to be necessary shall be included in a subsequent quarterly settlement.

[500] § 18. The quarterly account must be verified and the amount thereof must be paid within 6 weeks from the date on which the debtor administration has received it. After this period, the sums due to one administration by another shall bear interest at the rate of 6 percent per annum, dating from the day following expiration of the said period of grace.

[501] § 19. (1) In the absence of a different agreement, the balance of the quarterly account shall be paid by the debtor administration to the creditor administration, in gold or by means of checks or sight drafts drawn up for an amount equivalent to the amount of the balance expressed in gold francs.

[502] (2) In case of payment by means of checks or drafts, these papers shall be drawn up in the currency of a country where the central issuing bank or another official issuing institution buys and sells gold or gold currency for the national currency at fixed rates determined by law or by virtue of an agreement with the government. If the currencies of several countries answer these conditions, it shall devolve upon the creditor administration to indicate the currency which it desires. Conversion shall be made at par of gold currency.

[503] (3) In the case where the currency of a creditor country does not comply with the conditions set forth above under (2), and if the two countries have an agreement on the subject, the checks or drafts may also be drawn up in the currency of the creditor country. In this case, the balance shall be converted at par of gold currency into the currency of a country complying with the above conditions. The resulting values shall then be converted into the currency of the debtor country, and from that into the currency of the creditor country, at the rate of exchange of the capital or of a place of commerce of the debtor country on the day of delivery of the purchasing order for the check or draft.

[504] § 20. Remittance charges shall be borne by the debtor administration.

[505] § 21. The originals of radiotelegrams and statements of accounts relating thereto shall be preserved until the settlement of the accounts to which they relate and in any case for at least 10 months, counting from the month following the filing of the radiotelegram, with all necessary precautions to maintain secrecy.

ARTICLE 28

Aeronautical Radio Service of Public Correspondence

[506] In the absence of special arrangements (art. 13 of the Convention) the provisions of the present Regulations concerning the procedure for the exchange of or accounting for radio communications shall be applicable, in a general way, to the areonautical radio service of public correspondence.

ARTICLE 29

Service of Low-power Mobile Radiotelephone Stations[1]

[507] § 1. The following provisions affect only the service of mobile radiotelephone stations, in which the carrier-wave power in the antenna does not exceed 100 watts [except by regional agreements provided for in art. 10, § 7 (4) of the present Regulations] within the band 1,530 to 2,000 kc (196.1 to 150 m).

[508] § 2. The service of such a station must be performed by an operator holding a radiotelephone operator's certificate. (Art. 10, § 7 of the present Regulations.)

[509] § 3. (1) In order to call coast stations, the call signal or the geographical name of the place, as it appears in the nomenclature of coast and ship stations, or in the nomenclature of stations operating special services, may be used as a radiotelephone call signal.

[510] (2) In order to call ship stations, either the name of the ship or a call signal conforming to the provisions of article 14 of the present Regulations may be used as a radiotelephone call signal.

[511] (3) In case the name and the nationality of the ship cannot be ascertained beyond doubt, the call signal or the name shall be preceded by the name of the owner.

[512] § 4. (1) The wave of 1,650 kc (182 m) is a calling wave for the radiotelephone mobile service. It may be used under the conditions stipulated in article 7, § 7 [table, notes (11) and (13)]. This rule shall not preclude the use of other frequencies which may be determined by the administrations for the radiotelephone service with coast or ship stations designated by them.

[513] (2) Coast and ship stations using the 1,650-kc (182-m) calling wave must have available at least one other wave in the band 1,530 to 2,000 kc (196.1 to 150 m). This second wave shall be printed in boldface type in the nomenclature of the stations, to indicate that it is the normal working wave of the station. The working waves of these stations must be selected in such a manner as to avoid interference with the other radio stations.

[514] (3) In addition to the normal working wave, coast and ship stations may use additional waves in the band mentioned. These waves shall be indicated in the nomenclature in ordinary type.

[515] § 5. (1) In case of distress, if it is not possible to use the general distress wave of 500 kc (600 m) for radiotelephony, the wave of 1,650 kc (182 m) may be used for distress call and traffic. The station may also use any other wave in order to attract attention, signal its position, and obtain help.

[516] (2) The radiotelephone distress signal shall consist of the spoken expression MAYDAY (corresponding to the French pronunciation of the expression "m'aider").

[517] § 6. The provisions concerning radiotelegraph service and, in particular, the provisions referring to interference, to the distress, urgent, and safety services, to the closing of services, and to calling (arts. 16, 20, 22, 23, and 18 of the present Regulations) shall, so far as it is practicable, and reasonable, be applicable to the mobile radiotelephone service.

[518] § 7. The procedure given in appendix 12 to the present Regulations may be applied in the service of low-power mobile radiotelephone stations.

ARTICLE 30

Special Services

A. METEOROLOGY

[519] § 1. Meteorological messages shall include:

[520] (a) messages intended for meteorological services officially charged with making weather forecasts and with the protection of maritime and aerial navigation;

[521] (b) messages of these meteorological services intended especially:

1st, for mobile stations of the maritime service;
2d, for the protection of the aeronautical service;
3d, for the public.

[522] The information contained in these messages may be:

(1) observations at scheduled hours;
(2) notices of dangerous phenomena;
(3) forecasts and warnings;
(4) statements on the general meteorological situation.

[523] § 2. (1) The various national meteorological services shall arrange for the establishment of common transmission programs in such a way as to use the transmitters best located for such extensive areas as the latter can serve.

[524] (2) The meteorological observations contained in the classes (a) and (b), 1st and 2d above (§ 1) shall, in principle, be written in an international meteorological code, whether they are transmitted by mobile stations or intended for them.

[525] § 3. For weather-observation messages intended for an official meteorological service, advantage shall be taken of the facilities resulting from the assignment of exclusive waves to synoptic meteorology and to aeronautical meteorology, in conformity with the regional agreements established by the services concerned for the use of these waves.

[526] § 4. (1) Meteorological messages intended especially for all mobile stations of the maritime service shall, in principle, be transmitted in accordance with a definite time schedule, and so far as possible, at hours when they may be received by those of the stations mentioned which have but one operator, the transmission speed being selected in such a way that the reading of the signals will be possible for an operator having only a second-class certificate.
[527] (2) During transmissions "to all" of meteorological messages intended for stations of the mobile service, all stations of this service whose transmissions might interfere with the reception of the messages in question must observe silence, in order to make it possible for all the stations desiring to receive the said messages.
[528] (3) Meteorological warning messages shall be transmitted immediately and must be repeated at the end of the first period of silence ensuing (see art. 19, § 2). These messages must be sent on the waves allocated to the maritime mobile service. Their transmission shall be preceded by the safety signal.
[529] (4) In addition to the regular information services provided for in the preceding subparagraphs, the administrations shall take the necessary steps so that, upon request, certain stations will be charged with communicating meteorological messages to stations of the mobile service.
[530] (5) The preceding rules shall be applicable to the aeronautical service so far as they do not conflict with more definite regional arrangements insuring at least equivalent protection to aerial navigation.
[531] § 5. (1) Messages emanating from mobile stations and containing information relative to the presence of tropical cyclones must be transmitted in as short a time as possible to the other neighboring mobile stations and to the competent authorities at the first point on the coast with which contact may be established. Their transmission shall be preceded by the safety signal.
[532] (2) Any mobile station may, for its own use, listen to the meteorological observations transmitted by other mobile stations even when they are addressed to a national meteorological service. The stations of the mobile service which transmit meteorological observations addressed to a national meteorological service shall not be required to repeat these observations; but the exchange, upon request, of information relating to weather conditions shall be authorized between mobile stations.

B. TIME SIGNALS—NOTICES TO NAVIGATORS

[533] § 6. The provisions of § 4 above shall be applicable to time signals and to notices to navigators, with the exception, as regards time signals, of the provisions contained in § 4 (3) of title A.
[534] § 7. Messages containing information relative to the presence of dangerous ice, dangerous wrecks, or of any other imminent danger to navigation, must be transmitted with as little delay as possible to the other neighboring mobile stations and to the competent authorities at the first point of the coast with which contact may be established. These transmissions must be preceded by the safety signal.
[535] § 8. When they deem it necessary, and on condition that the sender consents, the administrations may authorize their land stations to communicate to such maritime information agencies as they choose, and under conditions laid down by themselves, information concerning averages and disasters at sea or information of a general interest to navigation.

C. SERVICE OF RADIO DIRECTION-FINDING STATIONS

[536] § 9. The administrations to which radio direction-finding stations are subject accept no responsibility for the consequences of an inexact bearing.
[537] § 10. These administrations shall notify, for insertion in the nomenclature of stations carrying on special services, the characteristics of each radio direction-finding station, indicating for each one the sectors in which bearings are normally safe. Any change concerning this information must be published without delay; if the change is of a permanent nature, it must be communicated to the Bureau of the Union.
[538] § 11. (1) The normal radio direction-finding wave shall be the wave of 375 kc (800 m). In principle, all coastal radio direction-finding stations must be able to use it.[1] In addition, they must be able to take bearings from emissions made on 500 kc (600 m), particularly to locate distress, alarm, and urgent signals.
[539] (2) An aircraft station desiring to obtain its bearing must, in order to request same, call on the 333-kc (900-m) wave or on a wave assigned to the air route over which it is flying. Where an aircraft station, while in the vicinity of coast stations, calls them in order to obtain a bearing, it must use the watch frequency of these coast stations.
[540] § 12. The procedure to be followed in the radio direction-finding service is given in appendix 13.

D. RADIOBEACON SERVICE

[541] § 13. (1) When an administration deems it advisable, in the interests of maritime and aerial navigation, to organize a radiobeacon service, it may use for this purpose:
[542] (a) radiobeacons proper, established on land or on vessels permanently moored; the emissions of these radiobeacons may be either nondirectional or directional;
[543] (b) fixed stations, coast stations, or aeronautical stations designated to function also as radiobeacons, upon request of mobile stations.
[544] (2) Radiobeacons proper shall use the following waves:
[545] (a) In the European region, for the maritime radiobeacons, the waves of the band 290 to 320 kc (1,034 to 938 m) and, for the aeronautical radiobeacons the waves of the band 350 to 365 kc (857 to 822 m), as well as certain waves of the band 255 to 290 kc (1,176 to 1,034 m), selected by international aeronautical organizations.
[546] (b) In the other regions, for the maritime radiobeacons, the waves of the band 285 to 315 kc (1,053 to 952 m) and, for the aeronautical radiobeacons, the waves taken from the band 194 to 365 kc (1,546 to 822 m).
[547] (c) In addition, in Europe, Africa, Asia, the directional radiobeacons (maritime and aeronautical) may use the waves of the bands 1,500 to 1,630 kc (200 to 184 m) and 1,670 to 3,500 kc (179.6 to 85.71 m) under the conditions set forth in § 20 of article 7.
[548] (d) The use of type-B waves shall be prohibited for radiobeacons proper.
[549] (3) Other stations notified as radiobeacons shall use their normal frequency and their normal type of emission.
[550] § 14. Signals sent by radiobeacons must permit of exact and accurate observations; they must be chosen in such a way as to eliminate all doubt when the question arises of distinguishing among them two or more radiobeacons.
[551] § 15. The administrations which have organized a radiobeacon service accept no responsibility for the consequences of inexact bearings obtained by means of the radiobeacons of that service.
[552] § 16. (1) The administrations shall notify, for insertion in the nomenclature of stations operating special services, the characteristics of each radiobeacon proper, and of each station designated to operate as a radiobeacon, including, if necessary, indications of the sectors in which bearings are normally reliable.
[553] (2) Any modification or irregularity of operation occurring in the radiobeacon service must be published without delay; if the modification or irregularity of operation is of a permanent nature, it must be reported to the Bureau of the Union.

International Radio Consulting Committee (C.C.I.R.)

[554] § 1. An International Radio Consulting Committee (C.C.I.R.) shall be charged with the study of technical radio questions and those of which the solution depends principally upon considerations of a technical character, which shall be submitted to it by the administrations and radio operating companies.

[1] It is recognized that certain existing stations are not able to use this wave, but all new stations must be able to take bearings on 375 kc (800 m) and on 500 kc (600 m).

[555] § 2. (1) It shall be formed of experts of the administrations and radio operating companies or groups of radio operating companies recognized by their respective governments, which state their desire to participate in its work and undertake to contribute, in equal shares, to the common expenses of its meetings. The statement shall be addressed to the administration of the country in which the last administrative conference was held.

[556] (2) International organizations interested in radio studies, who shall have been designated by the last plenipotentiary or administrative conference, and who undertake to contribute to the expenses of the meetings, as indicated in the preceding subparagraph, shall also be admitted.

[557] (3) Each administration, company, group of companies, or international organization, shall defray the personal expenses of its own experts.

[558] § 3. In principle, the meetings of the C.C.I.R. shall take place every 5 years. However, a meeting which has been scheduled may be advanced or postponed by the administration calling it at the request of 10 participating administrations, if the number and nature of the questions to be studied warrant it.

[559] § 4. (1) The languages and method of voting used in the plenary assemblies, committees, and subcommittees, shall be those adopted by the last plenipotentiary or administrative conference.

[560] (2) However, when a country is not represented by an administration, the experts of the recognized operating companies of that country, in one body, and regardless of their number shall be entitled to one deliberative vote only.

[561] § 5. The Director of the Bureau of the Union, or his representative, and the representatives of the other International Consulting Committees, C.C.I.F. and C.C.I.T., shall have the right to take part in the meetings of the C.C.I.R. in an advisory capacity.

[562] § 6. The internal organization of the C.C.I.R. shall be governed by the provisions of appendix 14 to the present Regulations.

ARTICLE 32

Expenses of the Bureau of the Union

[563] § 1. The ordinary expenses of the Bureau of the Union for the radio service must not exceed the amount of 200,000 gold francs annually.

[564] § 2. However, if an extraordinary expense is incurred for printed matter or for various documents during a year, and the corresponding revenue is not collected during the same year, the Bureau shall be authorized, in this case only, to exceed the maximum credit provided for, with the understanding that the maximum credit for the following year shall be reduced by an amount equal to the above-mentioned excess.

[565] § 3. The sum of 200,000 gold francs may be modified later, with the consent of all the contracting parties.

APPENDIX 1

TABLE OF FREQUENCY TOLERANCES AND OF INSTABILITIES

(See article 6)

1. The frequency tolerance is the maximum permissible separation between the frequency assigned to a station and the actual frequency of emission.

2. This separation results from the combination of three errors:

(a) the error of the radio frequency meter or of the frequency indicator used;

(b) the error made when the set is adjusted;

(c) the slow variations of the transmitter frequency.

3. In the frequency tolerance, modulation is not to be considered.

4. The instability of the frequency is the maximum permissible separation resulting from the error mentioned in the above (c) only.

Table of frequency tolerances and of instabilities

	Tolerances permissible immediately	Tolerances permissible for new transmitters only after 1933	Instabilities permissible immediately	Instabilities permissible for new transmitters only after 1933
A. From 10 to 550 kilocycles (30,000 to 545 m):	±	±	±	±
(a) Fixed stations ..... percent	0.1	0.1
(b) Land stations ..... do	0.1	0.1
(c) Mobile stations using specified frequencies ..... percent	[1] 0.5	[1] 0.5
(d) Mobile stations using any wave within the band ..... percent			0.5	0.5
(e) Broadcasting ..... kilocycles	0.3	0.05
B. From 550 to 1,500 kilocycles (545 to 200 m):
(a) Broadcasting stations ..... kilocycles	0.3	0.05
(b) Land stations ..... percent	0.1	0.1
(c) Mobile stations using any wave within the band ..... percent			0.5	0.5
C. From 1,500 to 6,000 kilocycles (200 to 50 m):
(a) Fixed stations ..... percent	0.05	0.03
(b) Land stations ..... do	0.1	0.04
(c) Mobile stations using specified frequencies ..... percent	0.1	0.1
(d) Mobile stations using any wave within the band ..... kilocycles			5	3
(e) Low-power fixed and land stations (up to 250 watts-antenna) operating in the bands shared by fixed and mobile services ..... kilocycles	[2]	[2]	5	3
D. From 6,000 to 30,000 kc (50 to 10 m):
(a) Fixed stations ..... percent	0.05	0.02
(b) Land stations ..... do	.1	.04
(c) Mobile stations using specified frequencies ..... percent	.1	[3] .1
(d) Mobile stations using any wave within the band ..... percent			.1	.05
(e) Broadcasting stations ..... do	.03	.01
(f) Low-power fixed and land stations (up to 250 watts-antenna) operating in the bands shared by fixed and mobile services ..... percent	[2]	[2]	.1	.05

[1] It is recognized that a great number of spark transmitters and simple self-oscillator transmitters exist in this service which are not able to meet these requirements.

[2] The permissible tolerances not being given, the administrations shall fix tolerances as low as possible.

[3] 0.04 percent for frequencies within shared bands.

NOTE.—The administrations shall endeavor to take advantage of technical progress to reduce gradually the frequency tolerances and the limits of instability.

APPENDIX 2

TABLE OF FREQUENCY-BAND WIDTHS OCCUPIED BY THE EMISSIONS

(See article 6)

Generally, the frequency bands actually used by the different types of transmission at the present state of the art are indicated below:

Type of transmission	Width of the band in cycles per second (including both sidebands)
Telegraphy, speed of 100 words per minute, Morse code (40 dots per second):
On unmodulated continuous waves.	From 80 to 240 (corresponding to the fundamental keying frequency and to its third harmonic).
On modulated continuous waves.	Same figure as above, plus twice the modulation frequency.
Transmission of still pictures	Approximately the ratio between the number of picture elements [1] to be transmitted and the number of seconds necessary for the transmission. Example: 100,000 : 100 = 1,000.
Television	Approximately the product of the number of picture elements [1] in a single picture multiplied by the number of pictures transmitted per second. Example: 10,000 × 20 = 200,000.
Commercial radiotelephony	About 6,000.
High-quality radiotelephony, as, for instance, in broadcasting.	About 10,000 to 20,000.

[1] A cycle is composed of two elements, on black and one white; the modulation frequency therefore is one half of the number of elements transmitted per second.

FREQUENCY LIST

I. General

(a) With regard to fixed, land, and broadcasting stations, the administrations shall furnish the Bureau of the Union with a complete descriptive list of each frequency assigned to these stations (see art. 7, § 5).

(b) With regard to mobile stations, no complete descriptive list shall be furnished. Only the frequencies assigned to these stations in the bands reserved to them shall be indicated in the case of each country, for each category of stations separately (ship, aircraft, other vehicles).

Example:

5,525 kc (54.30 m) ship stations, United States of America
5,690 kc (52.72 m) aircraft stations, Brazil

(c) The frequencies assigned to stations carrying on special services as well as to amateur stations and private experimental stations shall be indicated collectively for each country and for each class of stations (example: 3,500 to 4,000 kc (85.71 to 75 m), amateur stations, Canada).

(d) In order to facilitate the use of the frequency list, the Bureau of the Union shall show on each page the frequency range of the allocation table which corresponds to the frequencies appearing on this page (example: 7,300 to 8,200 kc (41.10 to 36.59 m), fixed services).

(e) For technical terms and indications used in the list, it is recommended that the administrations refer to the Opinions of the C.C.I.R.

II. Notification

(a) The date of notification of a frequency, to be inserted in column 3a, is the date of the communication by which the Bureau of the Union was informed of the first allocation of this frequency to a station of the country indicated. The name of this station appears in column 5.

By country, in this list, is meant the country within the limits of which the station is installed.

(b) When a frequency is first notified for a station of a country, the date to be written in column 3b opposite this station is the same as that in column 3a. If the same frequency is later assigned to another station of the same country, the date of the first notification mentioned above shall be inserted in column 3a opposite the new station and, in column 3b, the date of the assignment of this frequency to this new station.

(c) If 2 years after the notification (column 3b) the station to which the notified frequency has been assigned is not operating on this frequency, the indications relating thereto shall be canceled, unless the administration concerned, which must be consulted by the Bureau of the Union 6 months before the expiration of the aforesaid period, has asked for their retention. In this case the dates of notification inserted in columns 3a and 3b shall remain.

[2] The figure to be entered in column 9 must permit a determination of the width of the frequency band occupied by the transmission. No sign shall precede the figure when the transmission uses both sidebands. If the transmission uses only one sideband, this is indicated by placing before the figure the sign + (sideband of frequencies above the carrier frequency) or − (sideband of frequencies below the carrier frequency).
[3] The speed in bands for the International Morse Code is approximately equal to 0.8 × words per minute.
[4] The administrations shall notify without delay the Bureau of the Union of the putting into service of any frequency for which a competle descriptive list appears in the frequency list.

Hello B, A replying, exact, exact, cutting off.

6th. A then cuts off the communication and the two stations resume their normal listening.

Remark: At the beginning of a communication, the calling formula shall be pronounced twice, both by the calling station and the station called. Once the communication is established, it shall be pronounced once only.

§ 2. Whenever the spelling of call letters, service abbreviations, and words is necessary, it shall be done according to the following table:

When the receiving station is certain that it has received the radiotelegram correctly, the repetition provided for in item 4 of § 1 shall not be necessary, unless it concerns a radiotelegram with collation. If repetition is waived, station B shall acknowledge receipt of the radiotelegram transmitted in the following manner:

Hello A, B replies, your radiotelegram well received, over.

APPENDIX 13

PROCEDURE TO OBTAIN RADIO DIRECTION-FINDING BEARINGS

(See article 30)

I. General Instructions

A. Before calling one or more radio direction-finding stations, the mobile station, in order to request its bearing, must refer to the nomenclature for:

1. The call signals of the stations to be called to obtain the radio direction-finding bearings desired.

2. The wave on which the radio direction-finding stations watch, and the wave or waves on which they take bearings.

3. The radio direction-finding stations which by means of special wire connections, may be grouped with the radio direction-finding station to be called.

B. The procedure to be followed by the mobile station depends on varying circumstances. Generally, the following must be taken into account:

1. If the radio direction-finding stations do not listen on the same wave, whether it be the wave on which bearings are taken or another wave, the bearings must be requested separately from each station or group of stations using a given wave.

2. If all the radio direction-finding stations concerned listen on the same wave, and if they are able to take bearings on a common wave—which may be a wave other than the listening wave—they must all be called together, in order that the bearings may be taken by all these stations at the same time, on one and the same transmission.

3. If several radio direction-finding stations are grouped by means of special wires, only one of them must be called, even if all are furnished with transmitting apparatus. In this case, the mobile stations must, however, if it is necessary, specify in the call by means of the call signals, the radio direction-finding stations whose bearings they wish to obtain.

II. Rules of Procedure

A. The mobile station shall call the radio direction-finding station or stations on the wave indicated in the nomenclature as being their watching-wave. It shall transmit the abbreviation QTE which means:

"I wish to know my radio direction-finding bearing with respect to the radio direction-finding station which I am calling."

or

"I wish to know my radio direction-finding bearing with respect to the station or stations whose call signals follow."

or

"I wish to know my radio direction-finding bearing with respect to the radio direction-finding stations grouped under your control," the necessary call signal or signals, and shall conclude by indicating, if necessary, the wave which it is going to use to have its bearing determined. It shall then await instructions.

B. The radio direction-finding station or stations called shall prepare to take the bearing; they shall, if necessary, notify the radio direction-finding stations with which they are connected. As soon as the radio direction-finding stations are ready, such of these stations as are provided with transmitters shall reply to the mobile station in the alphabetical order of their call signals, by giving their call signal followed by the letter K.

In the case of radio direction-finding stations which are grouped, the station called shall notify the other stations of the group and shall inform the mobile station as soon as the stations of the group are ready to take the bearing.

C. After having prepared its new transmitting wave, wherever this is required, the mobile station shall reply by sending its call signal sometimes combined with another signal, during a length of time sufficiently prolonged to take the bearing.

D. The radio direction-finding station or stations which are satisfied with the operation shall transmit the signal QTE ("Your true bearing with respect to me was . . . degrees"), preceded by the time of the observation and followed by a group of three figures (000 to 359), showing in degrees the true bearing of the mobile station with respect to the radio direction-finding station.

If a radio direction-finding station is not satisfied with the operation, it shall request the mobile station to repeat the transmission indicated under C.

E. As soon as the mobile station has received the result of the observation, it shall repeat the message to the radio direction-finding station, which shall then state that the repetition is correct or, when necessary, shall correct it by repeating the message. When the radio direction-finding station is certain that the mobile station has received the message correctly, it shall transmit the signal "end of work". This signal shall then be repeated by the mobile station, as an indication that the operation is completed.

F. The data concerning (a) the signal to be used to obtain the bearings; (b) the duration of the transmission to be made by the mobile station; and (c) the time used by the radio direction-finding station in question shall be given in the nomenclature.

APPENDIX 14

INTERNAL REGULATIONS OF THE INTERNATIONAL RADIO CONSULTING COMMITTEE (C.C.I.R.)

(See article 31)

ARTICLE 1

By "managing administration" shall be meant the administration in charge of organizing a meeting of the C.C.I.R. The managing administration shall start taking care of the work of the C.C.I.R. 5 months after the closing of the preceding meeting; its duties shall end 5 months after the closing of the meeting it has organized.

ARTICLE 2

The managing administration shall set the place and definite date of the meeting which it has charge of organizing.

At least 6 months before the aforesaid date, the managing administration shall address the invitation to this meeting to all the administrations of the International Telecommunication Union, and, through the latter, to the companies, groups of companies, and international radio organizations covered in article 31 of the General Radio Regulations.

ARTICLE 3

§ 1. The first meeting of the plenary assembly shall be opened by the managing administration. This assembly shall appoint the necessary committees and shall distribute to them the questions to be dealt with, in classes. It shall also appoint the president and the vice president of the C.C.I.R. and the chairman and the vice chairman or vice chairmen of each committee.

ARTICLE 5

In principle, the minutes and reports shall give only the main points of the statements of the delegates. However, each delegate shall have the right to require the insertion into the minutes or report, of any statement he has made, either in summary or verbatim, on condition that he furnish the text thereof not later than the morning following the end of the meeting.

ARTICLE 6

§ 1. Any delegation which might, for serious reasons, be prevented from attending meetings, shall have the right to entrust its vote or votes to another delegation. However, a single delegation may not, under these circumstances, combine and use the votes of more than two delegations, including its own vote or votes.

§ 2. A proposal shall be adopted only if supported by an absolute majority of the votes cast; in case of a tie it shall fall. The minutes shall show the number of delegations which voted in favor of and of those who voted against the proposal.

§ 3. Voting shall be conducted either by raising the hands, or, at the request of a delegation, by roll call in the alphabetical order of the French names of the participating countries. In the latter case, the minutes shall indicate the delegations who voted in favor of and those who voted against the proposal.

ARTICLE 7

§ 1. The committees created by the plenary assembly may be divided into subcommittees and the subcommittees into sub-subcommittees.

§ 2. The chairmen of the committees shall propose the selection of the chairman of each subcommittee and sub-subcommittee for the ratification of the respective committee. The committees, subcommittees, and sub-subcommittees shall appoint their own reporters.

§ 3. The opinions expressed by the committees must be marked: "unanimously" if the opinion has been expressed by the voters unanimously, or: "by a majority" if the opinion was adopted by a majority.

ARTICLE 8

The Bureau of the Union shall take part in the various tasks of the C.C.I.R. for the purpose of centralizing and publishing general documents for the use of the administrations.

ARTICLE 9

§ 1. At the closing session of the plenary assembly, the president shall communicate the list of opinions and that of the questions left to be solved and of the new questions submitted by the committees.

§ 2. The president shall place on record the final adoption of the opinions expressed, if any. If there is occasion for voting at the plenary assembly, the formulas "unanimously" or "by a majority" shall apply to this vote.

§ 3. Unsolved and new questions shall be recorded by the president if the assembly is in favor of continuing their study. The latter shall then inquire as to what administrations wish to take charge of preparing proposals relating to these questions and what other administrations or radio operating enterprises are willing to collaborate in the work. On the basis of the replies, he shall prepare an official list of the questions to be included in the agenda of the following meeting, with the indication of the centralizing administrations and of the collaborating administrations and private radio operating enterprises. This list shall be included in the minutes of the meeting.

§ 4. In the same session of the plenary assembly, the C.C.I.R., upon the offer or with the consent of the interested delegation, shall designate the administration which is to call the following meeting and the approximate date of that meeting.[1]

ARTICLE 10

§ 1. After the meeting is closed, the preparation of questions submitted for study shall be entrusted to the administration designated to organize the next meeting (new managing administration). The unfinished business shall, on the contrary, be entrusted to the former managing administration, which shall be in charge of completing it, in collaboration with the Bureau of the Union.

§ 2. The former managing administration shall forward the documents to the new managing administration not later than five months after the closing of this meeting.

ARTICLE 11

After the end of a meeting, all other questions which the administrations and radio operating companies wish to submit to the committee shall be addressed to the new managing administration. This administration shall include these questions in the agenda of the next meeting. However, no question may be included in this agenda if it has not been forwarded to the managing administration at least six months before the date of the meeting.

ARTICLE 12

§ 1. All documents pertaining to a meeting, having been sent to the managing administration before this meeting, or submitted during the meeting, shall be printed and distributed by the Bureau of the Union in collaboration with the managing administration.

§ 2. When the study of a question has been entrusted to a centralizing administration, it shall devolve upon this administration to take the necessary steps toward undertaking the study of the question. The collaborating administrations and radio operating companies must send their report on this question directly to the centralizing administration, 6 months before the date of the C.C.I.R. meeting, in order that the said administration may consider same in its general report and in its proposals.

§ 3. However, the administrations and radio operating companies shall be free to send another copy of their report to the Bureau of the Union, if they wish these reports to be communicated immediately and separately to all the administrations and companies concerned by the said Bureau.

ARTICLE 13

The managing administration may correspond directly with the administrations and radio operating companies recognized as being capable of collaborating in the work of the committee. It shall send at least one copy of the documents to the Bureau of the Union.

[1] Note of the B.I.: In its third plenary session, the Radiotelegraph Conference of Madrid decided that it would be permissible for the third meeting of the C.C.I.R. to make a study of the question as to whether or not it is advisable for this committee to meet at the same time and in the same place as the next administrative radiotelegraph conference. The recommendations of the C.C.I.R. on this point would have to be considered by the administration which will invite the next conference and by the other administrations of the Union which will decide to follow this recommendation, if the occasion arises.

The procedure to be followed after the third meeting of the C.C.I.R. is shown in the minutes of the fourth plenary session of the Radiotelegraph Conference of Madrid.

In witness whereof the plenipotentiaries listed below have drawn up this protocol and have signed it in one copy which shall remain in the archives of the Government of Spain and of which one copy shall be forwarded to each government signatory of the said protocol.

Done at Madrid, December 9, 1932.

[Here follow signatures. The countries which signed the final protocol are the same as those which signed the General Radio Regulations (see ante, pp. 226–242). For Poland, however, only Messrs. Kowalski and Krulisz signed.]

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have the message of the President read, and also the letter of the Secretary of State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message of the President and the letter of the Secretary of State will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
January 27, 1934.

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to their ratification, I transmit herewith an international telecommunication convention, the general radio regulations annexed thereto, and a separate radio protocol, all signed by the delegates of the United States to the International Radio Conference at Madrid on December 9, 1932.

The attention of the Senate is invited to the accompanying report of the Secretary of State and the copies therewith enclosed of those portions of the report of the American delegation to the Madrid conference which explain the radio provisions of the convention and the radio regulations.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 26, 1934.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President with a view to their transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, an international telecommunication convention, the general radio regulations annexed thereto, and a separate radio protocol noting reservations made by certain countries, all signed by the delegates of the United States to the International Radio Conference at Madrid on December 9, 1932. A translation into English accompanies each document.

Connected with the convention also as annexes are regulations relating to telegraphy and telephony, but these were not signed by the delegates of the United States and are not furnished for submission to the Senate. The convention and the radio regulations abrogate and replace as among the parties thereto the Washington Radio Convention and Regulations of November 25, 1927.

While, in addition to provisions relating to radio, the present convention contains provisions applicable as well to telegraphy and telephony, it is stipulated in article 2 of the convention that a government is bound by the provisions of the convention only with respect to the service or services the regulations concerning which it has accepted. As the delegation of the United States did not sign the telegraph or telephone regulations, the Government of the United States will have obligations under the convention only with respect to radio. There is no fundamental change from the position of the United States in regard to the other two subjects.

There are enclosed for the information of the Senate copies of those portions of the report of the delegation of the United States to the conference which are in explanation of the articles of the convention and the radio regulations. As stated by the delegates the Madrid convention introduces no new principles into the policy of the United States with respect to international electrical communication.

Respectfully submitted.

CORDELL HULL.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, this matter has been under consideration since 1925. About that time there was held in Washington an international convention dealing largely with the same subject. However, there were certain regulations provided by that convention, dealing particularly with telegraphic communication, which were opposed in the United States. First, permanent committees were appointed to work out the problems. At the meetings articles of convention were worked out, which were then taken up at Madrid. At Madrid the convention now under consideration was adopted.

I may say that by this convention it is intended to regulate the three forms of communication—the telegraph, cables, and wireless. The convention has been very carefully worked out for the purpose of preventing interference in the various countries, and facilitating communications and deliveries as between connecting companies. It has also dealt with the bands or wavelengths so as to overcome any conflict as between different nationalities.

I may further say that only one thing was brought up before the committee that caused the committee to hesitate with respect to this treaty, and that was the protest by the amateur broadcasters. They felt they were discriminated against. They were heard, however, in the matter, and those who were inclined to support them very frankly came to the conclusion that under this treaty the amateurs received protection such as they did not have before, and their supporters thereupon withdrew their objection to the treaty. Their protest was based on the ground that at the present time amateur broadcasters, who have accomplished so much for the science, are allowed in most places to send messages to a third person. We have made no objection to that in this country, but in most places in Europe radio broadcasting is owned and controlled by the government, and they do not desire the competition by amateurs in the absence of regulations governing it and in the absence of provision for licensing. On the other hand, without this treaty, which does allocate or set aside so many bands or cycles for the use of the amateur broadcaster, they would have no protection whatever in the use of radio, but might be stopped in any country whose government saw fit to stop them.

So I feel that the only protest that arose has been absolutely satisfied, so far as the committee is concerned. I may say that the committee brought before them a number of experts of the Government who explained this matter in detail and completely. I think that there can be no objection to the treaty.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, because of the fact that at one time I expected to be a member of the delegation which negotiated the pending treaty, and because of the further fact that I attended many sessions of those engaged in the preparation of the United States proposals presented to the Conference which drafted the treaty, perhaps, it is not inappropriate for me to say a word at this time in behalf of its ratification.

The treaty in some respects represents a very great advance over international regulation of communications. Until this treaty was negotiated, although wire and radio communication had been coming technically closer and closer together through the years, there had been separate agreements dealing with the two forms of communication—a wire convention, to which the United States had never been a party, and a radio convention to which the United States had been a party since 1912, I believe. In the pending convention both forms of communication are dealt with. I may say that the plan of this convention responds to the thought and purpose and to the proposal of the United States Government and of the delegates of the United States at this international gathering.

The convention is composed, first of all, of provisions which deal only with the general principles relating to communications. It next has an annex embodying general regulations which seek to amplify and make effective the general principles contained in the convention. Then there is a second annex dealing with what in this country our communications companies are disposed to regard as managerial or operating functions. Such authorities are all grouped in this annex to which the United States is not a party, the United States adhering only to the terms of the convention and to the general regulations.

I am fully persuaded that the delegates who represented the United States at this conference dealt with the subject matter with intelligence and with the utmost regard for the interests of the United States. I think we may safely ratify what they, under the guidance of our State Department, have worked out; and I concur in the hope of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] that the treaty may have the approval of this body.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word about the treaty. I had early in the session a considerable number of complaints from amateur radio operators and organizations of amateurs interested in radio, but the Senator from Nevada has explained that the hearings entirely satisfied these amateur radio complainants, as I understand.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I cannot go so far, probably, as to say that it satisfied all of them, but those on the committee who were looking after their interests and caused the hearing to be had advised them that they thought the treaty afforded to them more protection than they ever previously had.

Mr. DILL. I may say that since the hearings I have had no further complaint, so that I take it that they are satisfied.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think they are.

Mr. DILL. Aside from that, I have had no objection, and I think, as the Senator from Maine has said, there is much to be said in favor of this convention.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. I, too, have had representations from amateurs with respect to this treaty. I recall that in 1927 the amateurs were greatly disturbed at that time as to the provision to be made for them in the then pending radio treaty. The delegates from the United States then did everything possible in behalf of the amateurs of this country. I also feel sure that our delegation did everything possible for them at this Madrid Convention. I am fully persuaded, Mr. President, that if it were not for the provisions inserted herein in their behalf, the amateurs of the world and the amateurs of America would have, so far as international correspondence goes, a very much more difficult time than they now face under the terms of this treaty. In other words, I think, as does the Senator from Nevada, that this is a shield and a protection to them in their international interests.

Mr. DILL. That shield and that protection, however, come largely from foreign countries rather than from the Government of our own country. I think that the governments of foreign countries have been more unfriendly to amateurs, probably, than has our own Government.

Mr. WHITE. I think the Senator is quite right, and when I refer to a "shield and a protection" I mean that the United States has secured from foreign countries concessions in behalf of amateurs which could not be had except under the terms of this treaty.

Mr. DILL. I feel that with the continued development, the enlarged development, in fact, of the use of the short wave the amateur's claim becomes even more worthy of consideration than when the number of frequencies available were fewer than they now are. Personally, I am strongly in favor of the ratification of the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendment, the convention will be reported to the Senate.

The convention was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution of ratification will be read:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved (two thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive B, Seventy-third Congress, second session, an international telecommunication convention, the general radio regulations annexed thereto, and a separate radio protocol, all signed by the delegates of the United States to the International Radio Conference at Madrid on December 9, 1932.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution of ratification. [Putting the question.] Two thirds of the Senators present concurring therein, the resolution is agreed to and the convention is ratified.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume legislative session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed legislative session.

FEDERAL RESERVE LOANS TO INDUSTRIES

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] desires to proceed with a measure; and, in the absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], who is interested in the bill which is the unfinished business, it might be well to do that at this time, with the approval of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], who has charge of the unfinished business.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senate take up the banking bill unanimously reported some days ago from the Committee on Banking and Currency. It is Senate bill 3487, to authorize direct loans by Federal Reserve banks to going industries and commercial enterprises.

It will be recalled that some time ago it was proposed to establish within the Federal Reserve System an intermediate bank system, to be composed of 12 intermediate banks. That proposal was abandoned when some of us pointed out that it would involve a very cumbersome and very expensive overhead operation; and there was substituted for it this bill to authorize the Federal Reserve banks to make direct loans to going industries to the extent of the surplus of the Federal Reserve banks after they shall have paid into the insurance-deposit fund the assessment exacted of them. That would mean approximately $142,000,000. In addition to that, it is proposed to appropriate from the Treasury, out of the increment which resulted from taking from the Federal Reserve banks $2,800,000,000 of their gold, a similar sum of approximately $140,000,000, making a total fund of nearly $300,000,000 which may be loaned directly by Federal Reserve banks to going industries to replenish their capital or to expend their activities.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I will.

Mr. McNARY. I was absent from the Chamber when the able Senator from Virginia made his request. What is his desire at this time?

Mr. GLASS. If it is the desire to adjourn now, I should like to make this bill the unfinished business.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there is before the Senate now, as the unfinished business, the corporate reorganization bill. Does the Senator seek unanimous consent to take up for immediate consideration the bill to which he has referred?

Mr. GLASS. I was thinking of asking to have the bill considered as soon as possible. It is a very simple bill. Anybody can understand it with a few minutes of explanation.

Mr. McNARY. I certainly should not be faithful to my trust if I should permit unanimous consent to be given for the consideration of such an important bill as this at half past 4, with only a dozen or 15 Members present.

Mr. GLASS. Very well, then; I withdraw the request. The bill will not be any less important when I shall renew the request than it is now.

CORPORATE REORGANIZATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5884) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, I desire at this time to make a very brief statement and outline of the nature of the pending measure, being House bill 5884. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] has spent much time on the bill and has prepared a number of amendments to it. In his absence, I prefer tonight not to proceed further than I have indicated. The Senator from Delaware will be here in the morning.

The bill grants to corporations the same type of relief that was granted by the Seventy-second Congress to farmers, individuals, and railroads. The older Members of the body will remember that legislation. Three sections were added to the bankruptcy law giving to farmers, railroads, and individuals relief under certain conditions.

This bill follows in a general way the provisions of those amendments of the Seventy-second Congress. The mechanics naturally differs somewhat as applied to a corporation and to farmers or other individual persons; but the purposes of the bill and the mechanics are pretty much like those of the former piece of legislation.

The pending bill provides that any corporation may file a petition in a court of bankruptcy stating the jurisdictional facts, the nature of the business, describing the assets, the liabilities, the capital stock, and so forth, the facts showing the need for the relief demanded, and containing the allegation that the corporation is either insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature. Upon the filing of this petition the court, if it shall approve the filing of the petition, shall take charge of the property of the debtor wherever situate, and shall have the same powers as a receiver in an equity receivership proceeding in a United States court.

The bill provides that three or more creditors who hold provable claims in an aggregate of $1,000 or more may also file a petition accompanied by a plan, and in the case of the debtor corporation itself.

It further provides that three or more creditors holding provable claims of $1,000 or more, or stockholders holding 5 percent in number of all shares of stock of any class, may answer and controvert the allegations set forth in the petition.

The bill, then, at length specifies what the plan accompanying the petition must set forth. It is mandatory in most respects. It shall include provisions modifying or altering the rights of creditors generally; it may include provisions modifying or altering the rights of stockholders generally; and it shall provide for stockholders who do not join in the petition or approve the plan in order that the value of their equity may be thoroughly protected by the court. The plan shall also set out the means by which it shall be accomplished, by transfer or sale of property, appraisal and payment in cash of claims, or by the issuance of new securities, and the payment of claims with such new securities.

The measure is very comprehensive in setting up the plan and the means by which it shall be accomplished. It shall provide for the transfer of property, consolidation or merger with another corporation, retention of the property by the debtor, distribution of assets to the creditors, modification of liens, extensions of maturity dates of securities, amendment of the charter, and so forth. These provisions are all contained in the railroad legislation to which I have just referred.

After the petition shall have been approved, if it shall be approved by the court, the court may temporarily leave the debtor in charge of the assets or may appoint a trustee. In either event the court shall give 30 days' notice by 2 weeks' publication of a hearing on the petition, on the merits of which all claimants and creditors shall be fully notified, and shall be given their day in court to object or offer amendments to or suggest alterations in the plan.

The court shall also require schedules or other information to be filed by the debtor corporation showing the conduct of the debtor's affairs and the fairness of the proposed plan. It may require a list of all known bondholders and stockholders, together with their holdings and their post-office addresses, to be put into the hands of the different claimants and to be open to inspection by any creditor.

The court is empowered to fix the time when all these matters shall be heard, giving full opportunity to answer, either by intervening petition or otherwise, to anyone whose claims would be materially affected by a new merger or consolidation, or whatever the new plan may provide.

I think the bill is thoroughly well protected on the question of notice to all parties interested.

If the plan shall not be accepted within a reasonable time, the court may extend for not exceeding 6 months the time within which the plan must be approved by two thirds of the creditors of each class of claims and a majority of the stockholders.

The plan cannot be confirmed or the matter closed until it has been approved in writing by 66⅔ percent of the creditors and 50 percent of the stockholders.

If the corporation be an intrastate utility, subject to a regulatory board or commission, there must be the written approval and acceptance of that commission before the court can confirm the plan.

If it is interstate in character, all the regulatory boards and commissions in the various States where the property of the corporation is located must be notified and be given opportunity to object or to be heard on the merits of the plan.

If, after the hearings, and the statement of objections, modifications, or changes in the plan the court finally confirms the plan, if the court finds the plan to be fair, equitable, and feasible, accepted by the stockholders and creditors as I have described, two thirds of the creditors and one half of the stockholders, and finds that the interested regulatory commission has approved the plan, and that all sums of money to be paid by the debtor or other corporation for services are reasonable and fair, and that all proceedings have been in good faith, the court may then, finally, by decretal order, close the proceedings.

These, in general, are the outstanding provisions and conditions of the bill. I say it is a just bill, offering to corporations what farmers and individuals and railroads were given by enactment in the Seventy-second Congress.

There are two or three extra sections of the bill not necessarily connected with the plan of reorganization, one applying to the farmers, amending the section granting relief to individuals. By the old statute, they had to have a majority of the creditors agree on the plan. This new section provides that if it is impossible to obtain a majority of the creditors, the individual may submit a plan for the extension of his indebtedness, and not in composition of his indebtedness.

Section 3 is one which may or may not provoke some discussion tomorrow. It provides that, in the event a receiver shall be appointed by a district court, no one person, or firm, or bank, or corporation, shall be appointed so as to have a monopoly of the receiverships under that particular court. That is not connected particularly with the plan of reorganization, but has been put on as an amendment.

Section 4 is practically a reenactment of the old law, but adds to debts which are provable two additional classes of claims, one the awards of industrial commissions, the other damages awarded for breach of executory contracts, such as, for instance, future rents.

Section 5 is practically a reiteration of the old law, with some minor changes, which are not of importance.

Section 6 gives free postage to the conciliation commissioner appointed under the farmer's relief act.

Section 7 provides that where a railroad has invoked the jurisdiction of the court of bankruptcy, under the act of March 3, 1933, the filing of such petition shall not be cause for removal to the district court of any suits pending in the State or local courts at the time of the appointment of a receiver or trustee for the railroad.

This, in general, Mr. President, is the bill as it is presented. It passed the House at the last session. The committee has recommended a few amendments. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] will offer on his own behalf several more amendments.

We held no public hearings on the bill, but we have given it serious and conscientious attention, and I am of opinion that after the amendments shall have been disposed of, the bill should be passed, and that it will be a very helpful instrument for the rehabilitation of many corporate bodies and industrial institutions in this time of depression.

With the consent of the Senator from Arkansas, I ask that further consideration of the bill go over until tomorrow, when the Senator from Delaware can be present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That course is entirely agreeable to me.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, May 2, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MAY 1, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend Chester Burge Emerson, D.D., dean of Trinity Cathedral, Cleveland, Ohio, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, whose power is infinite, whose purpose is timeless, and whose peace is eternal, be mindful of us who strain at our limitations and fret in our dispeace. If Thou dost mark a sparrow's fall, wilt Thou not heed a nation's need? Guide our leaders and guard our destiny. Something more than human wisdom is needed at this time. We humbly ask for it. Something more than human strength is demanded. Help them to endure as seeing Thee, who art invisible. Keep them from fuming while the world burns. Give them good sense and good will. Where experience is lacking let them be slow with experiment. Help them to see the country, and see it whole, lest serving the few they do disservice to the many. Above all assist them to walk worthy of the high calling to which they are called, to legislate for this people without fear or favor, without partisanship or prejudice, but with probity and patience, to the end that prosperity may be restored and peace maintained at home and abroad. In Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE WHEELER-HOWARD BILL

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, this is the day of new deals, and one of the best new deals, in my view, is presented in H.R. 7902, now pending before the House. Without further reference thereto I desire now to give a better reference, and, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and the Clerk read a letter on the subject from the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington April 28, 1934.

MY DEAR MR. HOWARD: The Wheeler-Howard bill embodies the basic and broad principles of the administration for a new standard of dealing between the Federal Government and its Indian wards.

It is, in the main, a measure of justice that is long overdue. We can and should, without further delay, extend to the Indian the fundamental rights of political liberty and local self-government and the opportunities of education and economic assistance that they require in order to attain a wholesome American life. This but the obligation of honor of a powerful nation toward a people living among us and dependent upon our protection.

Certainly the continuance of autocratic rule by a Federal department over the lives of more than 200,000 citizens of this Nation is incompatible with American ideals of liberty. It also is destructive of the character and self-respect of a great race.

The continued application of the allotment laws, under which Indian wards have lost more than two thirds of their reservation lands, while the costs of Federal administration of these lands have steadily mounted, must be terminated.

Indians throughout the country have been stirred to a new hope. They say they stand at the end of the old trail. Certainly the figures of impoverishment and disease point to their impending extinction as a race unless basic changes in their conditions of life are effected.

I do not think such changes can be devised and carried out without the active cooperation of the Indians themselves.

The Wheeler-Howard bill offers the basis for such cooperation. It allows the Indian people to take an active and responsible part in the solution of their own problems.

I hope the principles enunciated by the Wheeler-Howard bill will be approved by the present session of the Congress.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Hon. EDGAR HOWARD,
House of Representatives.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the Legislature of the Philippine Islands unanimously accepted the Independence Act recently passed by this Congress. Today the distinguished Commissioner, Mr. GUEVARA, who has played so important a part in bringing about that legislation, desires to address the House for 15 minutes, and I ask unanimous consent that he may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a message of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands to the Philippine Legislature at the special session assembled yesterday, April 30, 1934; and I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, following my remarks on the Jones-Costigan sugar bill, the letter I addressed to the President of the United States dated April 30, the radiogram of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands sent to the War Department, released April 25, and the memorandum of April 27 sent to the President and the Secretaries of War and Agriculture on the same question, by former Senator Harry B. Hawes, in representation of the Philippine Sugar Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, following my remarks on the Jones-Costigan sugar bill, I include the letter I addressed to the President of the United States, dated April 30, the radiogram of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands sent to the War Department, released April 25, and the memorandum of April 27 sent to the President and the Secretaries of War and Agriculture on the same question by former Senator Harry B. Hawes in representation of the Philippine Sugar Association.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Philippine Legislature, called at a special session, accepted the Tydings-McDuffie Independence Act.

Under this act, the Congress of the United States has prescribed certain steps in the 10-year period following the establishment of the Philippine Commonwealth for the readjustment of our economic life prior to granting of independence. During this transition period, our imports of sugar, coconut oil, and cordage to this country will be limited at specified quantities.

I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to speak at this time on the subject of Philippine sugar imports into the United States. Congress has recently passed the sugar control bill, known as the Jones-Costigan bill, which is now before the President awaiting his signature. During the consideration of this legislation we have neither made any captious objections nor obstructed the efforts of the administration in its plan at sugar stabilization. But, Mr. Speaker, the Jones-Costigan bill, as passed by Congress, contains two provisions which may prove to be disastrous to the sugar industry in my country and may undermine the financial structure of our government.

One of these two provisions is that which makes the enforcement of the quotas retroactive to January 1, 1934. Under this provision we will have this year a surplus of 319,000 short tons, with the President's quota of 1,037,000 short tons for the Philippine Islands, and next year we will have a total surplus of 682,000 short tons. Unless this large surplus is absorbed it would cause considerable hardships to our farmers and would throw out of employment thousands of laborers, thereby precipitating social unrest.

So, Mr. Speaker, by the time we will inaugurate our new government under the Independence Act, our main industry, from which our government derives a considerable portion of its revenue, will have been paralyzed, and we will be faced with a serious social problem, at the same time that our government will find itself financially handicapped and unable to meet its increased obligations. I am sure no true American would want to plunge my country into such a situation. At this juncture I desire to insert in the RECORD the radiogram on this subject from His Excellency, Hon. Frank Murphy, Governor General of the Philippine Islands, to the Secretary of War.

The other provision of the Jones-Costigan bill, to which I referred, is that one providing for the fixing of quotas by the Secretary of Agriculture. In his message to Congress, President Roosevelt recommended a quota of 1,037,000 short tons for the Philippine Islands. As our crop, just harvested and which practically has already been marketed in the United States, amounts to 1,400,000 short tons, we will thus bear, under the President's quota, a cut of 363,000 short tons. This reduction, Mr. Speaker, is twice larger than that for any of the sugar areas, as may be seen from the following figures:

	Estimated production for United States market 1933-34 [1]	Quotas proposed by the President	Decrease	Percent of decrease
	Short tons	Short tons	Short tons
United States beet	1,750,000	[2] 1,550,000	200,000	11.4
Hawaii	1,025,000	935,000	90,000	8.8
Puerto Rico	925,000	821,000	104,000	11.1
Philippines	1,400,000	1,037,000	363,000	25.9
Cuba	2,240,000	1,944,000	296,000	13.2

[2] Increased by 100,000 tons from President's quota.

In spite of this heavy loss to our sugar producers, in our earnest desire to cooperate and assist in the administration's plan for improving the situation in the sugar industry we have accepted the President's quota of 1,037,000 short tons for the Philippine Islands. We have taken this as a basis for a practical limitation program in the Philippines. This program of restriction of sugar production is now in course of enforcement.

It can be readily seen, Mr. Speaker, that unless there is a limitation of production in the Philippine Islands there will be accumulated there a surplus of over 1,000,000 tons in the next 3 years. This will have a very depressing effect upon the price of sugar the world over, and will therefore bring to naught the administration's plan at sugar stabilization.

In the name of the 2,000,000 people in my country directly dependent upon the sugar industry, I therefore appeal for the maintenance of the quota of 1,037,000 short tons for the Philippine Islands, as recommended by the President, and its just enforcement, so that it would not be retroactive to the sugar that we have already shipped and sold to the United States.

APRIL 30, 1934.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
(Through the Secretary of War),
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Jones-Costigan sugar bill has excited spirited protests from Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and Cuba. The Philippines is comparatively silent, overwhelmed by the impending blow on her sugar industry by both the Jones-Costigan measure and the Tydings-McDuffie Independence Act.

Puerto Rico declares that her people are naturalized American citizens and deserve to be treated as such, and that in deciding on her sugar quota only one destructive hurricane in every 30 years should be taken into account.

Hawaii pleads that being a political integral part of the United States she is entitled to a definite quota in the bill on an equal and identical basis as the continental sugar-producing sections.

Cuba, through her multitude of sympathizers, is presented to the world as economically prostrate and revolution-ridden because of her inability to sell more sugar in the United States.

We of the Philippines are at the moment in the throes of a great political excitement. We are accepting the Tydings-McDuffie Act—taking the initial step leading to our separation from the United States.

Mr. President, the acceptance of that act marks the beginning of the winding up or liquidation process of our sugar industry as well as our other tariff-protected industries. We shall be going out of business, closing shop and getting bankrupt. We don't want to do this, but we are forced into it.

By all the principles that are American and humanitarian, the Philippines is entitled in this critical juncture to more than a perfunctory sympathetic treatment at the hands of the American Government.

The Puerto Rican hurricane is a gentle zephyr in its effects in comparison with the man-made political hurricane which is due to hit our sugar industry when we lose the American tariff protection.

Hawaii is going to have her Filipino labor, which is the mainstay of her sugar industry, although under the Tydings-McDuffie Act Filipino laborers over a quota of 50 will be barred from continental United States. Thus while Hawaii is pleading for equal treatment she is enjoying a special privilege. There is as much demand for Filipino labor in the lettuce fields of California as in the sugar plantation of Hawaii.

Impoverished Cuba has still $15 per capita monetary circulation, while the Philippines has less than $4 per capita. These two figures gain greater significance when it is considered that in education, in living standard, and in life's outlook disinterested observers declare that the Filipino people occupy a higher level than the bulk of the Cuban population.

Mr. President, with all our poverty we have not been a problem of law and order to America. We have not asked for special privileges. We have only tried to carry on under the benevolent auspices of the American Government, absorbing American ideas and ideals, learning the American language, and building our political and social institutions after the American pattern.

With mixed sadness and hope we are soon separating from the United States. Naturally our political separation requires our economic disentanglement from the American economic system. The process would be most difficult and devastating. It would shake and shatter the very foundation upon which we are expecting to erect the future Filipino nation.

I am asking you most earnestly, Mr. President, to let us down as gently as possible; to cushion our economic fall with some measure of help that is within your jurisdiction and that of the Secretary of Agriculture. Besides other considerations, the success of the Tydings-McDuffie Act may be jeopardized by an overstrain of economic calamities.

What the Philippine sugar industry wants and suggests are set forth succintly in a cablegram of Gov. Gen. Frank Murphy to the War Department, released to the press on April 25, and in the communication addressed to Your Excellency by the Philippine Sugar Association under date of April 27. I commend those two documents to your favorable consideration.

Faithfully yours,

PEDRO GUEVARA,
Resident Commissioner from the Philippines.

WAR DEPARTMENT

PROTESTS RECEIVED FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS AGAINST THE TERMS OF THE JONES-COSTIGAN SUGAR BILL (H.R. 8861)

The following radiogram relative to the Jones-Costigan bill has been received in the War Department from the Governor General of the Philippine Islands:

"The retroactive character of the Jones-Costigan sugar bill, which establishes January 1, 1934, as commencement date for quota, will leave us a large surplus of 610,000 tons of sugar, or two thirds an entire year's quota under the bill. Following wire from Iloilo Commercial Association: 'The International Chamber of Commerce and the Philippine Chamber of Commerce unanimously passed resolution in joint session today to move earnestly and request your assistance in urging the deletion of the retroactive effect of the Jones-Costigan bill. Draw special attention retroactive effect highly prejudicial sugar industry, especially mill planters who rely upon outside financial assistance. Also emphasize anomalous situation arriving between producers who have disposed of their production vis-à-vis, those who have sugar yet to mill or mill in Bodega. Passage of bill in present condition must inevitably deprive hundreds of thousands of laborers and families of present livelihood thereby probably engendering social disorders. Can you secure expression of administration's ideas of treatment which will be accorded sugar in excess of quota arriving in States this calendar year if bill is passed? Present uncertainty is paralyzing all business."

The conditions are as follows:

1. In 1933–34 there were produced for export to the United States 1,250,000 long tons of which not over 40,000 long tons reached the United States before January 1, 1934, thus leaving 1,210,000 long tons of the old crop to be exported during calendar year 1934 against the probable quota of not over 925,000 long tons. The carry-over into calendar year 1935 would thus be 285,000 long tons with no accommodations for fractional shipment of the 1934–35 crop.

2. Pending enactment of quota bills in the United States, our best efforts at voluntary limitation cannot do more than hold the 1934–35 crop to approximately the 1933–34 level, or 1,250,000 long tons available for export to the United States. This means that we would enter the year 1935 with a carry-over of 285,000 long tons from the 1933–34 crop and would have available the entire 1,250,000 long tons of the 1934–35 crop, or a total of 1,535,000 long tons against the probable quota of 925,000 long tons, thus increasing the carry-over at the end of 1935 to 610,000 long tons with no accommodation for fractional shipment of the 1935–36 crop.

3. By this time legal limitations under the quota law should be in effect, and we could assume normal restriction of the 1935–36 crop to 925,000 long tons. But we would still carry into 1936 the accumulation surplus of 610,000 long tons, which could only be wiped out by reducing production of 1935–36 crop not to the presumed limitation of 925,000 long tons but to 315,000 long tons, or about one fourth of the present production and one third of the probable quota. A general allotment of so small a production to all centrals and all planters would be economically and commercially impracticable, and we should probably be forced to shut down entirely for one season, creating very serious financial and social difficulty during the first or second year of the Commonwealth. The alternatives would be to hold the 610,000 long-ton surplus over the market or dump it in the Orient or Europe, in either case depreciating world price.

The situation would be avoided if the Jones-Costigan bill were amended to eliminate its retroactive and run the quota years on a United States fiscal-year basis, beginning July 1, 1934. In this event the balance of 1933–34 crop could be disposed of before the quota became effective, and we would have only such standing surplus as would represent excess of the 1934–35 crop over the quota, or about 325,000 long tons, which might more easily be absorbed.

IN THE MATTER OF PHILIPPINE SUGAR

To the PRESIDENT, the SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE, and the SECRETARY OF WAR:

THE PHILIPPINE SITUATION

On May 1 the Philippine Legislature will take the first step to accept the American offer of independence.

Under the provisions of this bill complete independence will not be granted for 10 years. The American flag will fly over the Philippines during that period and an American commissioner appointed by the President will supervise the financial policy of the Commonwealth, carrying with it during these 10 years the responsibility both for financial stability and the preservation of law and order.

Comparing this with our responsibility in Cuba, we find that the latter is limited under the Platte amendment to the maintenance of order.

There are in the Philippines 14,000,000 people; in Cuba 3,500,000.

The Philippines is the eighth best customer of the United States. Our manufactures and agricultural products are purchased there in greater amounts per capita than in India, China, and Japan, and exceed in volume the sales made to any Latin American country.

Any revolutionary or drastic upset of the present Philippine financial stability will be a violation of the implied promises contained in the Philippine independence offer and will very properly subject our country to criticism not only in the islands but throughout the Orient; in addition, it will endanger American investments in the islands, which Americans were urged to make, stimulated by efforts of our own Government.

Free-trade status for the islands was established by our Congress in 1909 over the official protest of the Philippine Legislature.

The independence law provides for a limitation of the free importation of Philippine sugar into the United States. This was fixed at the then high peak of 1931, when the bill was under consideration at 955,920 short tons.

This limitation, however, will not be in effect until the establishment of the Philippine Commonwealth. Prior to this there is no limitation on the amount of sugar that the Philippines can send to the United States free of duty.

Under the Independence Act there is no limitation on the quantity of Philippine sugar coming to the United States except that duties are imposed on all sugar in excess of the limitation of 955,920 short tons.

It can be readily seen that unless there is a limitation of production in the Philippine Islands there will be in the next 3 years an accumulated surplus there of over 1,000,000 short tons, which will have a very depressing effect not only upon the world market but also upon the American market and, therefore, will nullify all efforts toward sugar stabilization in the United States.

THE JONES-COSTIGAN ACT

The Jones-Costigan Act just passed by Congress contains two provisions in which the Philippine sugar industry is vitally concerned. These are—

(1) The retroactive effect of the bill to January 1, 1934, as to quotas; and

(2) The quota for the Philippine Islands to be assigned by the Secretary of Agriculture.

RETROACTIVE EFFECT

If through administrative action the bill should be made retroactive to January 1, 1934, on the quota for the Philippine Islands, it will leave the Philippines a surplus this year of 319,000 short tons. For the 2 years 1934 and 1935 there will have accumulated a surplus in the Philippine Islands of 682,000 short tons.

This may be seen from the following figures:

	Short tons
Available for export, 1933–34	1,400,000
Estimated arrival in United States before Jan. 1, 1934	44,000
Balance export to United States for 1934 out of crop 1933–34	1,356,000
Probable quota for Philippine Islands, 1934	1,037,000
Carry-over for 1935	319,000
Available for export, 1934–35 crop	1,400,000
Total available, 1935	1,719,000
Probable quota for 1935	1,037,000
Carry-over for 1936	682,000

It will thus be seen that when the Philippine Commonwealth begins to operate the Philippines will find their main industry in a paralyzed condition.

In order to adjust their production to the export limit to the United States under the quota law, the sugar centrals will have to produce for export only 355,000 short tons for the 1935–36 crop, or 25 percent of their normal production for export.

With this low rate of operation it is doubtful if any of the sugar centrals could continue to operate.

Hundreds of thousands of laborers would thus be thrown out of employment and millions of invested capital would be lost.

As the Philippine government derives a great portion of its revenue from the sugar industry, the government would be financially embarrassed at a time when it needs greater funds to meet its increased obligations under the independence law.

CONFUSION AND DISTRESS IN THE PHILIPPINES

Moreover, if the bill should be made retroactive to January 1 on the quota of the Philippine Islands, it would cause much confusion in the adjustment and allocation of the quotas among the various factories and the thousands of individual planters.

Unlike other sugar-producing areas, in the Philippines sugar production is in the hands of thousands of small farmers.

The 45 sugar factories in the Philippines, mostly owned by Filipinos and Americans, do not grow sugarcane, as they do not own the land on which sugarcane is grown.

Thousands of individual planters grow the sugarcane and deliver this cane to a single factory, which converts the cane into sugar.

Under this existing cooperative system of sugar production in the Philippine Islands, the sugar central receives from 40 to 45 percent of the sugar produced from the cane, and the planters get from 55 to 60 percent thereof.

As soon as the sugar is manufactured by the central, distribution takes place and the sugar planters, after receipt of their sugar, sell their share to sugar exporters.

Insofar as the 1933–34 crop is concerned, the sugar planters and centrals have not only already received their respective shares but have sold them to the various sugar exporters and received their money therefor.

The exporters have already marketed this sugar in the United States, most of which has already been paid for by buyers.

To make the quota for the Philippine Islands apply to the crop that is already harvested and sold in the United States would, therefore, be impossible without causing serious troubles in the Philippine Islands.

INDIVIDUAL ILLUSTRATION

In his conference with officials of the War Department and the Department of Agriculture before he left recently for the Philippines, the Honorable Rafael R. Alunan, president of the Philippine Sugar Association, pointed out the disastrous effect of making the quota date retroactive to January 1, 1934, upon individual planters in the Philippines, in the following illustration:

"A planter with a production for the 1933–34 crop of, say, 1,000 tons receives 600 tons for himself as his share and leaves with the central 400 tons. This planter has already sold his share to the various exporters, say, 200 to A, 200 to B, and 200 to C, for which he has already received payment and very likely spent the proceeds.

"If the Philippines is given a quota on the basis of the President's figure of 1,037,000 short tons, and such a quota becomes retroactive to January 1, 1934, this particular planter will have a quota for his past crop of say 400 tons. He has already exceeded his quota by 200 tons, which has already been disposed of.

"It would be utterly impossible to make him give up the money he has received for the 200 tons, representing the excess of his production over his quota, or to make any other party bear the loss for these 200 tons as a consequence of the retroactive effect of the bill."

The foregoing individual case is a typical example of what is going to happen in the Philippine Islands if the quota date of the bill should be made retroactive to January 1, 1934.

A retroactive application of the quota could not be enforced.

QUOTA ENFORCEMENT SHOULD COMMENCE JULY 1, 1934

We would, therefore, request that the effective date of the quota provisions of the bill be made to coincide with the crop-year instead of the calendar year; in other words, we propose that the enforcement of the quotas shall commence on July 1, 1934, and not on January 1, 1934.

In the marketing agreement signed by the producers last fall the marketing year was fixed to commence on July 1 in order to coincide with the harvesting periods of the various producing areas, which, according to Willett & Gray, are as follows:

United States beet, July to January; Louisiana, October to January; Florida, December to April; Hawaii, November to June; Puerto Rico, January to June; Philippine Islands, November to June; Virgin Islands, January to June; Cuba, December to June.

The fixing of July 1, 1934, as the commencement date for the enforcement of quotas would to a great extent minimize the difficulties and sacrifices that will be borne by the Philippine sugar producers under the sugar control law.

It takes from 45 to 60 days for a cargo of sugar from the Philippines to reach the Atlantic seaboard. For this reason, and because of the lack of adequate warehouse facilities, shipment of sugar from the islands has to be made immediately after the sugar has been placed in the bag at the factory, hence the heavy exportation of sugar during the grinding period, from November to June.

QUOTAS

The figure 955,920 short tons was the high peak in 1931, at the time the Hawes-Cutting bill placed its limitations.

In a 3 months' hearing on the marketing agreement it was agreed by all the sugar-producing areas that the Philippine quota should be 1,100,000 short tons. (This was protested at the time by the Philippine representatives.)

Since that time President Roosevelt, on February 8, placed the quota for the Philippine Islands at 1,037,000 short tons, and Governor General Murphy, the Philippine producers, and the Philippine Legislature first started to work on the theory of 1,100,000 short tons, and, since the President's message, on the theory of 1,037,000 short tons.

Neither of these quotas is considered equitable. The reason is obvious.

Of the principal areas supplying sugar to the United States, the Philippines bears the largest quantity and percentage of reduction under the President's quotas, as may be seen from the following figures:

	Estimated production for United States market 1933-34 [1]	Quotas proposed by the President	Decrease	Percent of decrease
	Short tons	Short tons	Short tons
United States beet	1,750,000	[2] 1,550,000	200,000	11.4
Hawaii	1,025,000	935,000	90,000	8.8
Puerto Rico	925,000	821,000	104,000	11.1
Philippines	1,400,000	1,037,000	363,000	25.9
Cuba	2,240,000	1,944,000	296,000	13.2

[2] Increased by 100,000 tons from President's quota.

This table shows that the decrease in the Philippine quota has been over twice as great as that of any other area under the American flag and nearly 100 percent greater than the reduction in the Cuban quota.

We therefore respectfully urge that, as a great portion of the total revenue of the islands comes from sugar, and that as the quota cut is over twice that of any other area and almost 100 percent over that of Cuba, there should be no further cut on the Philippine quota given by the President of 1,037,000, which already will mean a curtailment of 363,000 tons annually.

Respectfully submitted.

PHILIPPINE SUGAR ASSOCIATION,

United States Representative,
Representing 99 percent of Philippine sugar producers.

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 27, 1934.

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, 36 years ago the American Fleet, commanded by Admiral Dewey, entered Manila Bay flying the flag of liberty and of justice for all oppressed people in the world. A battle ensued with the Spanish armada which was the guard of the sovereignty of that Nation over the Philippines. The forces of freedom won, and the American flag was hoisted amidst the enthusiasm and blessings of the Filipino people.

Coincident, Mr. Speaker, with this glorious day of victory for the United States, the Philippine Legislature assembled in special session on May 1, 1934, accepted Public Act No. 127, Seventy-third Congress, commonly known as the "McDuffie-Tydings bill", enacted by Congress on March 24, 1934. This law was enacted in fulfillment of the pledge of this Nation to grant independence to the people of the Philippine Islands at the earliest practicable time. In view of this enactment and its acceptance by the Philippine Legislature, moral responsibilities and obligations on the part of both nations become increasingly apparent. At this juncture I wish to quote part of the message of the President of the United States to Congress on March 2, 1934, upon which the enactment of Public Act 127 was predicated:

> May I emphasize that while we desire to grant complete independence at the earliest proper moment, to effect this result without allowing sufficient time for necessary political and economic adjustments would be a definite injustice to the people of the Philippine Islands themselves little short of a denial of independence itself. To change at this time the economic provisions of the previous law would reflect discredit on ourselves.

We are now confronted, Mr. Speaker, with a situation which must be faced honorably and loyally both by the United States and by the Philippines. I believe I am not mistaken in affirming that the postponement of the day of the granting of independence to the Philippine Islands was for the purpose of giving the inhabitants therein a reasonable period of time to adjust their economic life, which by the sovereign will of the United States has been linked to her economic system for the past 30 years.

If I correctly understand the policy and philosophy which inspired the formulation and adoption of Public Act 127, it is the avowed purpose of the United States to grant independence to the people of the Philippine Islands in order that they may be able to receive the blessings of that grant without regard to or consideration of any selfish interest. For this, I am sure, the Filipino people are grateful.

Mr. Speaker, Public Act 127 is now a solemn covenant between the United States and the Philippine Islands, and its terms must be observed without reservation by either party. The Filipino people, I am sure, are prepared to do their part in the observance of its terms. I think I am safe in saying that the United States also is sympathetically willing to do her part to make of the covenant a success, thus giving the now struggling world a practical example of the sanctity of national pledges. By so doing, this Nation will only be following the course that she herself has outlined since the inception of her occupation of the Philippines. It is well to call to memory the message of the American people to the Philippines, transmitted on April 4, 1899, by the first civil commission appointed by the President of the United States to the Philippines, and signed by Jacob Gould Schurman, George Dewey, Elwell S. Ottis, Charles Denby, and Dean C. Worcester, which in part says:

> The Commission desire to assure the people of the Philippine Islands of the cordial good will and fraternal feeling which is entertained for them by His Excellency the President of the United States and by the American people. The aim and object of the American Government, apart from the fulfillment of the solemn obligations it has assumed toward the family of nations by the acceptance of sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, is the well-being, the prosperity, and the happiness of the Philippine people and their elevation and advancement to a position among the most civilized peoples of the world.

The message of President Roosevelt to Congress on March 2, 1934, to which I have referred is but a confirmation of that of the American people to the Philippines on April 4, 1899. The policy announced in that message was translated into reality by subsequent legislation enacted by the Congress of the United States which tended to fulfill her solemn obligations assumed toward the family of nations by the acceptance of sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to promote the well-being, the prosperity, and the happiness of the Filipino people and their elevation and advancement to a position among the most civilized peoples of the world. The enactment of Public Act No. 127, Seventy-third Congress, leads the Filipinos to the goal of their aspirations and ambitions through the generous and kind assistance of the American people. This will undoubtedly add a new glorious chapter to America's immortal history.

By a rare quirk of fate, however, there has been some effort to thwart the humanitarian endeavors of the American people in their dealings with the Philippines. The enactment of the 1934 revenue bill by which an excise tax of 3 cents is levied on every pound of coconut oil entering the United States from the Philippines will be a reversal of the policy which inspired the formulation and adoption of Public Act 127. It offsets the benevolent and altruistic aims of the American people in their desire to create a new nation in the Far East. It amounts to a deviation from the complete fulfillment of the terms of the covenant as written in Public Act 127.

Surely it is improper to assume that just because the United States is powerful she will fail to observe the terms of the covenant, or that just because the Filipino people are weak they will have to make good their obligations in accordance with the covenant. The Filipinos will fulfill their moral and legal obligations flowing from the covenant because they are sincerely convinced that they are dealing with a Nation whose sense of justice and fair play is acknowledged the world over.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great reluctance that I am discussing this phase of the question today when the American and Filipino peoples should be indulging in the hopes of happier days for the Philippines. To the United States belongs the credit for the birth of a new nation in the Far East, and to the Philippines the satisfaction of being the recipient of the beneficent results of this altruism. Should anyone living under the American flag hinder the success of the American policy at this time when the international situation in the Far East appears gloomy and disturbing? Should he, indeed, do anything to obstruct the ultimate success of the American policy in the Philippines? These are questions that call for patriotic consideration on the part of the American people. I realize the hardships and economic difficulties that are now assailing every nook and corner of this mighty Nation. If there were some concrete assurance that the sacrifice of the Filipino people would help to promote the prosperity of the United States, then the Filipinos may perhaps undergo that sacrifice. After due consideration, however, one merely reaches the inescapable conclusion that this will benefit neither the United States nor the Philippines. It will be prejudicial to both countries and peoples. Why, then, embark on an experiment whose prospective advantages to the American farmer are only imaginary?

I hope I am mistaken in my prediction as to the effect of the disintegration of the terms of Public Act 127. The revenue bill which amends the fundamentals of the economic provisions of the McDuffie-Tydings law will cause the economic penetration of the Philippines by some nation who will be more than willing to take advantage of the situation. Indirectly, it will justify the attempt to destroy the open-door policy successfully inaugurated and maintained by the United States in China. It will deprive the Filipino people of the equal opportunity to which they are entitled under the American flag by the terms and conditions of the solemn covenant just accepted by the Philippine Legislature. It will depress the American trade in the Philippines, for diminishing the purchasing power of its inhabitants will reduce their capacity to buy American goods. Also, when the Filipinos cannot export to the United States, as a consequence they cannot import from her. This is an elemental principle of trade.

It seems tragic that after the enactment of Public Act No. 127 steps should be taken to defeat its very aims and purposes. I refuse to believe that the American people as a whole are willing to sanction any policy which will have the effect of taking back with one hand what has just been given with the other. I know this to be true, for it is not the American spirit nor the characteristic of American traditions which have successfully stood the vicissitudes of years.

Out of my loyalty and gratitude to this country, I am compelled to mention some of these questions, for I feel myself duty bound to do my utmost to place on a high level America's honor and prestige, which have never successfully been challenged.

On behalf of the Filipino people, I wish to convey to the American people through their constitutional Representatives in Congress our profound gratitude for the enactment of the independence act. It will establish an everlasting friendship and a cordial understanding between the United States and the Philippines, and I hope it will be conducive to their mutual advantage. [Applause.]

The matter referred to above is as follows:

MESSAGE DELIVERED BY HON. FRANK MURPHY, GOVERNOR GENERAL OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS, ON APRIL 30, 1934, AT THE OPENING OF THE SPECIAL SESSION OF THE NINTH PHILIPPINE LEGISLATURE

Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the legislature, you have been assembled here today in special session to consider and take action on an act of Congress which object, according to its title, is to provide for the complete independence of the Philippine Islands and for the adoption of a constitution and a form of government.

Upon my arrival at Manila on June 15 last, speaking of the act then under discussion, I announced a purpose to leave the question of its acceptance to the free and uncontrolled determination of the Philippine people. That has been my undeviating policy, and still is.

This special meeting of the ninth legislature during its closing weeks has been summoned only because of a desire to provide time for adequate consideration and discussion of the measure that has been placed before you; and in the event of an affirmative decision thereon, to facilitate the proper and deliberate exercise and discharge of the very important rights, privileges, and duties created by that measure. It was also my concern and purpose to prevent or minimize the risk of involuntary noncompliance with its provisions and the unintentional forfeiture and lapse of the rights conferred through unexpected delay in the required legislative and administrative processes.

In submitting these matters to you, may I be permitted to voice the earnest hope of all true friends of Philippine liberty that the responsibility you are about to assume may be discharged with complete fidelity to the high moral principles and political ideals that have made this occasion possible and brought us to this eventful hour. In the event of affirmative action, your further deliberations and dispositions should be animated and guided by a clear and steady and united purpose to insure as far as possible a constitutional assembly that will be truly representative of all the people and worthy of matchless opportunity and grave responsibility with which it will be entrusted.

In the serious work that lies ahead, let no man think first of individual or partial advantage. It is not merely the success of a group or a party that is at stake. It is the happiness and well being of a whole people; it is a nation in the making. The fond hopes and aspirations of your countrymen, nurtured through the years, are now in your hands for good or ill. If it shall be your determination that these aspirations will be brought to desired fruition and fulfillment by acceptance of this act, there should be woven into the fabric of the new government the highest moral and spiritual qualities of the people, the wisdom and understanding and idealism of the best and bravest men and women of these islands. If the framework of government is to be strong and stable and serviceable, it must have able designs and competent builders, men and women of broad training and experience, endowed with human sympathy and lofty character, possessing the confidence of all the people and a clear understanding of their varied needs and problems. Such men and women are to be had, and it will be your duty to provide the best means of insuring their selection.

Tomorrow marks another anniversary of the memorable victory of the American naval forces in Manila Bay. That was an event of supreme significance in the promise it contained for the political future of the Filipino people. That promise has now been consummated in a manner that is probably without precedent in the colonial policies of great nations by a formal enactment that confirms in unmistakable fashion the noble and unselfish purposes of the American people in establishing their sovereignty over these islands. America has given proof to the world by practical demonstration that altruism may be not merely an ideal but a reality in the foreign policy of a great nation.

The recent and prevailing economic disturbance in the United States, far more serious than anything we have experienced here, has brought to the fore an apparent conflict of interest between certain economic groups in that country and the more important Philippine industries. This has given rise, perhaps quite naturally, to a certain degree of confusion and doubt with respect to the real motives that have inspired and made possible this action of the American Government. The coincidence of recent protective aims and measures with the initiation of the final steps in the brilliant and glorious program of Philippine development and deliberation should not be permitted to cloud our perspective. If economic factors have entered and played a part in the framing and adoption of the final act of liberation, this and the preparatory work that precedes it have been fundamentally conditioned and suspended and inspired by the political idealism and altruism of the American people. The eventual freedom and independence of the Philippines have been a definite ideal of our people for more than a generation. This, as I know and understand it, has been the real attitude of the great body of American citizens, who have had no other interests in this country and its people than to secure to them the same blessings of liberty and freedom, and equal rights and privileges, that they have inherited from their fathers.

In these troublous days since the World War, when other men and other nations have turned their minds away from the great principles of democracy and self-government, America has remained steadfast to those principles. She has that faith for herself and for others. The Philippines, if they choose to accept this measure, will eventually have achieved freedom and independence and the principal assurance of individual liberty and democracy provided therein, without bloodshed or burdensome expenditures; not through the working of selfish economic forces, as some believe, but because it is the profound conviction of the plain people of America that other people have the same moral right to these things that they once claimed and dearly won for themselves.

Whatever decision may be made, therefore, we gladly and properly make acknowledgment at this time and on this occasion of the high-minded purposes and sympathetic assistance of the men who have sponsored the cause of Philippine independence in the Halls of Congress, of the able efforts of Secretary of War Dern, and to President Roosevelt for his powerful and effective leadership at the final moment and his stanch support of Philippine interests generally. Honor is due also to those distinguished Americans of an earlier day, both civil and military, who have labored valiantly and whole-heartedly in making this country ready for the day when freedom should strike. And to those Filipino patriots who have fought and suffered and died to realize that which may now be attained, and to the representatives of the Philippine Government and this legislature who have given able and distinguished advocacy to their country's cause in the long negotiations that have been brought to the present stage of completion and success—whatever the future may hold, to them a grateful country will ever yield affectionate remembrance.

The ultimate decision on the question before us, as we all know, must be made by the Filipino people, when they pass on the work of a constitutional assembly convened in accordance with the law. Such a decision must be based on truth and understanding. It is preeminently a time for candor and tolerance, for frank and fair speech without fear or intimidation. It is equally a time for courage and faith—faith in self, faith in our fellow men, faith in country. In the days to come there should be no divisions or enmities based on differences of race or birth or creed or color. The country will have need of all loyal men and women who have ability and disposition to contribute, no matter how much or how little, to her development and culture and greatness. A man's worth as citizen and neighbor should have no other test. More than ever before the realization must prevail that you are comrades dependent upon one another, irresistible when united as one people. With charity in our heart, with good will and tolerance for all, with serene confidence in the divine providence that insures our destiny, let us boldly choose our course and follow it with unwavering loyalty.

THE APPALLING SCHOOL SITUATION AND A PLEA FOR SPEED IN DEALING WITH THE EDUCATION PROBLEM OF THE NATION

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that the Committee on Education in the House has not yet reported out a bill providing for Federal relief for schools. Some 25 or 30 splendid bills along this line have been introduced by individual Members, including my own bill—H.R. 7520 of January 31, 1934—which was one of the first introduced, but the committee has not yet passed one of these bills nor finished drafting one of their own. In my interviews with members of the Education Committee over this delay, I always get the same response, "We are making a thorough study of all the bills introduced for the relief of education and incorporating the best features of these into a committee bill which we will finish drafting as soon as we can call upon the President and ascertain his views in the matter."

COMMITTEE SHOULD SPEED BILL

This, I will agree, is proper procedure, but the millions of friends of education throughout the Nation are getting impatient over this continued delay which, it seems to me, is unnecessarily prolonged, in view of the fact that Congress is considering adjournment at no distant date.

EDUCATION ENTITLED TO SHARE IN NATIONAL RECOVERY PROGRAM

It is imperative that the Federal Government come at once to the rescue of the school children, the future citizenship of our country. The Federal Government has launched a series of important steps looking toward national recovery. Through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation it has extended billions of dollars of credit to banks, railroads, life-insurance companies, and other corporations; it has provided subsidies to shipping interests and for the transportation of mail; it has provided pensions and hospitalization for ex-service men; it has provided food and clothing for free distribution to needy people; and through the P.W.A., the C.W.A., and the F.E.R.A. it has given emergency employment to millions of unemployed people during the past winter; but despite the fact that education has shared in the effects of the general economic collapse, Congress has not yet enacted any important legislation to help the schools meet their pressing financial problems.

SCHOOLS OF NATION IN SERIOUS FINANCIAL CONDITION

The teaching profession has experienced serious financial reverses; schools are in need of equipment, which has been greatly curtailed during the recent depression, and many school children are suffering the loss of educational advantages, which it is our duty to help provide. Expenditures for schools throughout the Nation in 1933–34 have been estimated at $1,753,300,000, a reduction of nearly $200,000,000 below expenditures of the previous year and a reduction of more than $500,000,000 below the expenditures of 5 years ago. This reduction has occurred in spite of the fact that total enrollments at present are 675,000 greater than they were 5 years ago. In spite of the funds disbursed since October 1933 by the Federal Emergency Relief Administration for the relief of certain weak schools, it is reported that in January 1934 about 770 schools were closed, with no provision for the education of 175,000 children. In many communities where funds are exhausted the teachers continue to work without pay. Total teachers' salary arrears now exceed $55,000,000, while outstanding emergency school district warrants amount to over $70,000,000.

One city in every four has reduced its school term, and this year thousands of rural schools will operate for less than 6 months. Teachers' salaries have been cut until at least 1 in every 4 is receiving annual wages of less than $750 and about 85,000 teachers are receiving less than $450 per year.

OUTLOOK WORSE FOR 1934–35

Although the conditions described above constitute a grave problem, it seems inevitable that with increasing enrollment and added responsibilities, they will be even worse in the year 1934–35. School revenues are expected to show a somewhat further decline next year. It is estimated that the total amount of school revenue will be $1,554,300,000, a reduction of $200,000,000 since last year and a reduction of a half billion dollars since 1930.

The total amount of emergency Federal aid needed by the States for next year merely to keep schools open for a normal term is at least $118,615,000. Following is a table showing the estimated amount needed by the various State departments of education:

Estimates of the amount of emergency Federal aid needed by various States for 1934–35 merely to keep schools open for a normal term on a greatly restricted basis

CONGRESS MUST ACT AT ONCE

The figures and estimates I have given you have been compiled by the National Education Association, a most reliable source, and they must be accepted as most nearly correct. It is clearly evident the school situation is an appalling one, which must be met before this Congress adjourns. The Federal Government has gone into almost every other field of service, why cannot it help the school children? I have spent 9 years in the teaching profession, and I continue to make a close study of school conditions. The situation in my own State, Oklahoma, is acute. The estimated need of our State for Federal aid for 1934–35, merely to keep schools open for a normal term, is $2,000,000. This great Government of ours surely cannot stand by and see its school system collapse. Congress must act and do it at once for the schools of the Nation will begin the next school term in September of this year and Congress will not be in session again until next January. I am placing a copy of this speech in the hands of every member of the Committee on Education, and I plead with them to draft and report a bill at once so we can work for its passage.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill (H.R. 9179) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes, which I introduced on April 17, 1934.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point, and to include therein a little statement by the President of the United States of about 100 words.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

THE GREATEST STEAL IN AMERICAN HISTORY

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Speaker, during the past few weeks I have been cooperating with Mr. E. W. Mason, intermediary officer, Progressive Party, congressional bloc, Washington, D.C., developing the facts in the greatest steal ever permitted by a legislative body in American history. I refer to the passage of the law which extended the rights of the Federal Reserve banks to borrow money on United States securities. The great unanswerable question is, Why do we keep on in this camouflage and financial policy of issuing tax-exempt interest-bearing securities when we know the law permits the colossal steal I wish to call attention to here?

The Federal Reserve banks now have about three billions of United States funds, drawing interest from 2⅞ to 4 percent.

The old law provides that upon the tender of the Federal Reserve bank, a private corporation, to the Federal Reserve agent, a United States Government official, of certain collateral and the cost of printing the bills—which is now 0.007 cent each—the Government shall coin and pay the Federal Reserve bank currency equal to the collateral tendered.

All the benefits, such as interest and premiums, go to the bank and not to the Government. The collateral is stored in the safety-deposit vault of the bank itself.

This bill specified that United States securities—bonds—may be used for a limited number of years.

It has been found that at 0.7 of a cent per bill the cost of an average $1,000 purchase is anywhere from 26 cents to 40 cents, according to the denomination ordered. A $5 bill and a $10,000 bill cost exactly the same, viz, $0.007. In the calculations I am to make here I shall figure on the basis of 30 cents per thousand dollars being the cost of the bills.

President Roosevelt wishes to float nine billions in bonds.

Here is the possible workout:

FIRST OPERATION

Federal Reserve bank tenders the United States Government 1,000,000,000 of present owned bonds and $300,000 in currency and asks for a billion of new currency.

The Government deposits the bonds in the box at the bank. These bonds still pay interest to the bank. The $300,000 which pays for the cost of printing goes to the United States Treasury at Washington. The Treasury delivers to the bank $1,000,000,000 in new currency.

The bank takes the billion and returns it to the Government for a billion of new bonds drawing 2⅞-percent interest—Secretary Morgenthau's bargain rate announced in the papers.

The Government delivers the bonds to the bank. The bank now has a new billion. This new billion takes the place of the billion put up as collateral in the course of this first operation. Thus the bank has only spent $300,000 (the cost of printing the bills), and their interest on the new billion of bonds during the first year is $28,750,000, or a net advantage to the bank of $28,450,000 the first year and $28,750,000 each succeeding year until the bonds are paid. When one remembers that Civil War bonds are still outstanding—perhaps forming part of the billion of bonds tendered by the bank in this operation—one gathers an idea of the immensity of the steal.

SECOND OPERATION

The bank tenders the new billion of bonds to the Government and $300,000 in currency for a billion in new money. The Government deposits the bonds, still drawing interest to the bank, in the bank's own vault and sends the $300,000 to the Treasury to cover the cost of printing.

The Government delivers to the bank one billion in new currency.

The bank returns the billion to the Government for a billion of bonds. The Government delivers the bonds and the bank now has two new billions of bonds, with an annual interest income of $57,500,000 for an outlay of $600,000.

THIRD OPERATION

The bank tenders $300,000 and the billion of bonds from operation two to the Government for a billion of new currency.

The Government delivers the money.

The bank returns the money for a billion of bonds.

The Government delivers the bonds and the bank now has three billion of bonds at interest, at an investment of $900,000 and an annual interest income of $86,250,000. You will notice that the interest is greater than the new investment by nearly 10 times.

FOURTH OPERATION

Just the same as the preceding. The investment is increased to $1,200,000 and the annual interest is $115,000,000.

FIFTH OPERATION

Same as preceding. The investment is now $1,500,000, and the annual interest has slipped up to $143,750,000.

SIXTH OPERATION

Investment	$1,800,000
Annual interest	172,500,000

SEVENTH OPERATION

Investment	$2,100,000
Annual interest	201,250,000

EIGHTH OPERATION

Investment	$2,400,000
Annual interest	230,000,000

NINTH OPERATION

Investment	2,700,000
Annual interest	258,750,000

The ninth billion dollars in bonds is now free and clear and substitutes the original billion that was used as collateral in buying the first billion dollars of currency. The real cost of the interest privilege of $9,000,000,000 is but $2,700,000.

To recapitulate:

Total investment	$2,700,000.00
Daily interest	708,904.11
Yearly interest	258,750,000.00
Daily interest on $1	.26255
Yearly interest on $1	95.83

Usual yearly rate of interest, 6 percent; annual rate of interest on this investment of $2,700,000, 95.83 percent.

It will be seen that the banker makes a loan from the Government on his collateral (bonds), for an indefinite period, at 0.003 percent. When the farmer wishes to make a loan on his collateral (farm) he pays every year 0.045 percent. The laboring man pays every year 0.06 percent. In other words, the farmer pays 150 times as much in 1 year as the banker pays during the life of the currency, and the laborer pays 200 times as much in 1 year as the banker pays during the life of the currency.

The Frazier-Lemke bill would make the farmer pay only 50 times as much as the banker, or 0.015 percent.

You will notice that every dollar invested by the banker draws a yearly interest of $95.83, or a daily interest of $0.26255.

You will also notice that the extra tax burden the President is putting on the people is about $1,000,000 for every working day of the year for the interest on the $9,000,000,000 of bonds.

Further, the only difference between giving these $9,000,000,000 of printing-press money direct to the people instead of selling it to the bankers and buying it back again is that the bankers are paid by the Government $258,750,000 a year by the latter method. It is still printing-press money. I want to call your attention here to the difference between sound and unsound money. Sound money pays interest to the bankers. Unsound money pays them no interest.

A further point: We have seen the President's plans referred to as of socialistic origin and tendency. In the question of bonds—which are bondage—Norman Thomas, Socialist Party candidate for the Presidency, even called on the President and urged him to issue twelve billions of relief bonds instead of five billions then proposed. Senators CUTTING and LA FOLLETTE worked for days to get Roosevelt to issue more relief bonds—more bondage—but the President bravely (?) held down to only nine billions for the robbers, making a small daily dole for the impoverished bankers of $708,904.11.

Other profits, probably greater than the interest on the bonds tabulated above, are possible by the ability of the bankers to loan that credit money at high interest rates. Ten to fifteen billions or more could easily be juggled in a credit structure. Then there is the possibility of the bankers never having to repay the deposit itself; as, due to clearing-house custom, it is merely the clearing-house balances that have to be taken care of; in the long run, the deposits above equaling the withdrawals. The possibilities and figures in connection with this latter point are dazzling but are based on speculation only, and so I do not attempt here to give you even an estimate of them.

As a sample of this, note that any bill destroyed in circulation goes to the credit of the bankers.

The history of the Civil War, Cleveland panic, and Panama Canal bonds—now, due to refunding, known as "consols"—is that they have already cost the Government in interest much more than their face value. Presuming that history will repeat itself with the present and proposed bonds, it will eventually represent a profit to the bankers of over ten billions on an actual investment of $2,700,000. But if we suppose these bonds are only issued once—that is, not refunded but paid in full in 10 years—we have the following figures:

Interest (10 years)	$2,875,000,000
Only actual cost	2,700,000
Profit	2,873,300,000

This means a possible profit in 10 years of $1,064.07 on every dollar invested. That would be $10.64 on every single penny invested.

My brain reels as I write these figures, but they are true, though they seem absurd they are so startling. This law was an administration measure. The President personally called up Representative PATMAN and other Members of Congress, who were working conscientiously against the measure, and asked them to stop, promising them that he would later "hit the money changers between the eyes." The President gives them from $2,873,300,000 to about $18,000,000,000, and then says he proposes to hit them hard. By calling them names?

The President whole-heartedly goes back of the Federal Reserve bank in these words, which appear in the Federal Reserve Bulletin of February—a publication of a private corporation printed by the Public Printer—viz:

> It gives me pleasure at this time to express my appreciation of the splendid services that the Federal Reserve System has rendered in connection with our efforts to bring about recovery. It has been an institution of incalculable value throughout the 20 years of its existence; soon after its organization it was an important factor in enabling this country to aid in winning the war; and more recently it has given firm support to the Government's efforts in fighting the depression. It has stood loyally by the interest of the people by supplying them with a sound currency, by placing at the disposal of member banks a large volume of reserves available to finance recovery, by exerting a powerful influence toward the rehabilitation of the commercial banking structure, and by cooperating in every way with the Government's financial program.

Press dispatches indicate that the Treasury Department has effected a deal with the Morgan firm to float the bonds. Secretary Morgenthau announces a "bargain interest rate on the bonds of 2⅞ percent." The Washington Herald blazed in their issue of January 27, in big headlines, that the Morgan Co. are cooperating whole-heartedly with the administration in stabilizing our monetary system at $0.60 in international exchange. No stronger evidence could be had that the administration, or at least that part of it, are determined that the monetary policies of the Government are a part and parcel of the manipulation. It is not an experiment, and I wonder if when the President was penning the words, quoted above, in praise of 20 years of this gigantic lobby—if he thoroughly understood how his good intention and popular standing among the masses of the Nation were being used to further this diabolical scheme by men who are misleading him.

The forgotten international bankers have been taken care of to the tune of at least $2,875,300,000 in interest and possibly an ultimate final profit of $18,000,000,000 while they are being called "money changers" in a deprecating sense.

The big question now is, Shall we give a thousand dollars to the bankers for 30 cents and charge the farmers $45 for a like amount, $44.70 more than the bankers have to pay? Incidentally, the workers, who are not farmers, can obtain the same thousand for $60 or $59.70 more than a banker.

On February 28, 1934, this bill known as "Senate 2766" was reported from the committee, was unanimously agreed to by the full Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, and reported on the floor to be unanimously passed without protest by the Senate. In the House, I am proud to say that among the 38 Members who voted against this measure, when it was passed on March 3, we find the 5 Farmer-Labor Members, including myself, who were aware of the dangers lurking in a bill of this kind, and could not bring ourselves to sell out the people of the United States in this subtle way.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on tomorrow, Calendar Wednesday, be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

THE TAX BILL

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 7835) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, before the report is read, may I ask the gentleman from Washington a question with reference to the time of debate on the conference report. Is there any disposition on the part of the majority side to extend the time beyond the usual 1 hour?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. May I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that it occurs to me that 1 hour will be ample time for the discussion of this report. In view of the fact that other business is pressing, I am loath to agree to an extension. I should like to accommodate the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I do not feel inclined to do so under the circumstances.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman would like to do it, but does not feel he can?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is correct.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is a very fair statement. I will have to accept the inevitable. It is a very short time to discuss so important a bill as this, but the gentleman has the authority, and I yield gracefully.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

"(a) Privilege to file consolidated returns: An affiliated group of corporations shall, subject to the provisions of this section, have the privilege of making a consolidated return for the taxable year in lieu of separate returns. The making of a consolidated return shall be upon the condition that all the corporations which have been members of the affiliated group at any time during the taxable year for which the return is made consent to all the regulations under subsection (b) (or, in case such regulations are not prescribed prior to the making of the return, then the regulations prescribed under section 141 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1932 insofar as not inconsistent with this act) prescribed prior to the making of such return; and the making of a consolidated return shall be considered as such consent. In the case of a corporation which is a member of the affiliated group for a fractional part of the year the consolidated return shall include the income of such corporation for such part of the year as it is a member of the affiliated group.

"(b) Regulations: The Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe such regulations as he may deem necessary in order that the tax liability of any affiliated group of corporations making a consolidated return and of each corporation in the group, both during and after the period of affiliation, may be determined, computed, assessed, collected, and adjusted in such manner as clearly to reflect the income and to prevent avoidance of tax liability.

"(c) Computation and payment of tax: In any case in which a consolidated return is made the tax shall be determined, computed, assessed, collected, and adjusted in accordance with the regulations under subsection (b) (or, in case such regulations are not prescribed prior to the making of the return, then the regulations prescribed under section 141 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1932 insofar as not inconsistent with this act) prescribed prior to the date on which such return is made; except that there shall be added to the rate of tax prescribed by section 13 (a) a rate of 2 percent, but the tax at such increased rate shall be considered as imposed by section 13 (a).

"(d) Definition of 'affiliated group': As used in this section an 'affiliated group' means one or more chains of corporations connected through stock ownership with a common parent corporation if—

"(1) At least 95 percent of the stock of each of the corporations (except the common parent corporation) is owned directly by one or more of the other corporations; and

"(2) The common parent corporation owns directly at least 95 percent of the stock of at least one of the other corporations; and

"(3) Each of the corporations is either (A) a corporation whose principal business is that of a common carrier by railroad or (B) a corporation the assets of which consist principally of stock in such corporations and which does not itself operate a business other than that of a common carrier by railroad. For the purpose of determining whether the principal business of a corporation is that of a common carrier by railroad, if a common carrier by railroad has leased its railroad properties and such properties are operated as such by another common carrier by railroad, the business of receiving rents for such railroad properties shall be considered as the business of a common carrier by railroad.

"As used in this subsection (except in par. (3)) the term 'stock' does not include nonvoting stock which is limited and preferred as to dividends.

"(e) Foreign corporations: A foreign corporation shall not be deemed to be affiliated with any other corporation within the meaning of this section.

"(f) China Trade Act corporations: A corporation organized under the China Trade Act, 1922, shall not be deemed to be affiliated with any other corporation within the meaning of this section.

"(g) Corporations deriving income from possessions of United States: For the purposes of this section a corporation entitled to the benefits of section 251, by reason of receiving a large percentage of its income from possessions of the United States, shall be treated as a foreign corporation.

"(h) Subsidiary Formed to Comply With Foreign Law.—In the case of a domestic corporation owning or controlling, directly or indirectly, 100 percent of the capital stock (exclusive of directors' qualifying shares) of a corporation organized under the laws of a contiguous foreign country and maintained solely for the purpose of complying with the laws of such country as to title and operation of property, such foreign corporation may, at the option of the domestic corporation, be treated for the purpose of this title as a domestic corporation.

"(i) Suspension of Running of Statute of Limitations.—If a notice under section 272 (a) in respect of a deficiency for any taxable year is mailed to a corporation, the suspension of the running of the statute of limitations, provided in section 277, shall apply in the case of corporations with which such corporation made a consolidated return for such taxable year.

"(j) Allocation of Income and Deductions.—For allocation of income and deductions of related trades or businesses, see section 45."

In the case of a foreign life insurance company the credit shall not exceed an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount otherwise allowed as a credit as the reserve funds required by law and held by it at the end of the taxable year upon business transacted within the United States is of the reserve funds held by it at the end of the taxable year upon all business transacted"; and the Senate agree to the same.

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 124: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 124, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 32 of the Senate engrossed amendments strike out all of the page after line 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) The term 'undistributed adjusted net income' means the adjusted net income minus the sum of:

"(A) 20 percent of the excess of the adjusted net income over the amount of dividends received from personal holding companies which are allowable as a deduction for the purposes of the tax imposed by section 13 or 204;

"(B) Amounts used or set aside to retire indebtedness incurred prior to January 1, 1934, if such amounts are reasonable with reference to the size and terms of such indebtedness; and

"(C) Dividends paid during the taxable year.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 7835) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment no. 2: In the House bill the surtax rates commenced at 4 percent upon surtax net incomes of $4,000 and not in excess of $8,000 and increased progressively by brackets to 59 percent upon the portion of the surtax net income in excess of $1,000,000. The Senate amendment increases the surtax rates in all brackets up to and including the bracket of surtax net incomes of $26,000 to $32,000. Above this bracket the Senate amendment makes no rate changes. Under the Senate amendment the surtax rates commence at 5 percent upon surtax net incomes of $4,000 and not in excess of $6,000. The Senate amendment affects, however, the total surtaxes paid in the higher brackets on account of the cumulative nature of the surtax schedule. Under the House bill the total surtax on a surtax net income of $1,000,000 is $532,740, while under the Senate amendment the total surtax on the same amount of surtax net income is $533,240.

In respect to this Senate amendment, the House recedes with an amendment decreasing the surtax rates proposed by the Senate up to and including the bracket of surtax net incomes of $16,000 to $18,000. The rates proposed in these lower brackets add 1 percent to the House rates, except in the first bracket covering surtax net incomes of $4,000 to $6,000, in which case the rate is 4 percent as in the House bill.

The following table shows the differences between the surtax rates contained in the House bill, the Senate amendment, and the conference agreement:

On amendments nos. 3, 4, 5, and 6: These make clerical changes in cross references; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 7: This amendment is necessitated by amendments nos. 15 and 25; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 8: This is a clerical change, and the House recedes.

On amendments nos. 9, 10, 11, and 12: These make clerical changes in cross references; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 14: The House bill requires an annuitant to include in his gross income a portion of the annual receipts in an amount equal to 3 percent of the cost of the annuity. The Senate amendment excepts from the House change persons whose aggregate receipts from annuities in the year do not exceed $500, and makes some minor changes in phraseology. The House recedes with an amendment rejecting the $500 exception.

On amendments nos. 15 and 25: Under the House bill interest on obligations of the United States and of certain of its instrumentalities which under the acts authorizing their issue was exempt from normal tax but subject to surtax, was included in gross income in the case of an individual, but excluded in the case of a corporation. Senate amendment no. 15 includes all such interest in gross income in the case of corporations as well as individuals, and amendment no. 25 allows the amount thereof as a credit to corporations against net income for the purposes of the normal corporation tax. Thus the interest on such obligations remains in gross income and net income for the purpose of corporate surtaxes, such as sections 102 and 351 of the bill as passed by the Senate. The House recedes on both amendments.

On amendment no. 16: This is a clerical amendment; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 17: Under existing law interest paid on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations (other than obligations of the United States issued after Sept. 24, 1917, and originally subscribed for by the taxpayer) is not allowed as a deduction if the interest received on such obligations is wholly exempt from income taxes. The House bill also denies the deduction if the proceeds of such indebtedness were used to purchase or carry such obligations, regardless of the purpose of the taxpayer in incurring such indebtedness. The Senate amendment restores the provisions of existing law; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 18: Under existing law a taxpayer is denied a deduction for interest paid or accrued on money borrowed to purchase an annuity. The House bill also denies the deduction if the money borrowed was actually used to purchase an annuity even though the indebtedness was not incurred for that purpose. The Senate amendment permits a deduction in both of such cases; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 19: This amendment prohibits any deduction for contributions made to certain organizations, a substantial part of the activities of which is participation in partisan politics or is carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting, to influence legislation; and the House recedes with an amendment striking out the words " participation in partisan politics or is."

On amendment no. 20: The House bill disallows deductions allocable to tax-exempt income. The Senate amendment excepts from the House provision deductions allocable to tax-exempt interest; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 21: The House bill disallowed deductions allocable to income wholly exempt to the taxpayer from the taxes imposed by title I. The Senate amendment makes the disallowance of the deduction depend on whether the income is wholly exempt from the taxes imposed by title I. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 22: Under the House bill no deduction is allowed for losses in the case of sales or exchanges of property between members of a family, or between a shareholder and a corporation in which such shareholder owns a majority of the voting stock. The Senate amendment makes a slight change with respect to transfers to a closely held corporation. Instead of making the test depend upon the ownership of a majority of the voting stock of such corporation, the standard is changed so that it depends upon the ownership of 50 percent in value of the outstanding stock. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 23: This amendment eliminates a cross-reference made unnecessary by amendment no. 77 eliminating the requirement of withholding of tax at the source in the case of tax-free covenant bonds; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 24: This amendment increases the maximum earned net income allowed under the House bill from $8,000 to $20,000; and the House recedes with an amendment making the maximum $14,000.

On amendment no. 25: See amendment no. 15.

On amendment no. 26: This is a change in section number; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 27: Under the House bill all items of income and deductions accrued up to the date of the death of the decedent were required to be reflected in the last return filed by the decedent, regardless of the fact that he may have kept his books on a cash basis. The Senate amendment makes a clarifying change to the effect that a credit of the accrued items, such as dividends and interest on partially tax-exempt securities, will also be permitted in such cases. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 28: This amendment makes it clear that where the profit on the sale or exchange of property is returned on the installment basis by spreading the profit over the period during which the installment obligations are satisfied or disposed of, such profit shall be taken into account under the brackets set forth in section 117 of the bill according to the period for which the original property sold was held rather than according to the period for which the installment obligations were held; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 29: This amendment permits a taxpayer holding installment obligations on December 31, 1933 (which originally matured prior to January 1, 1934, but which were extended so as to mature after that date), the option of paying the tax on such installments when paid or otherwise disposed of at the 12½-percent capital-gain rate provided for in existing law. The Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 30: This is a clerical amendment; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 31: This is a clerical amendment changing a section number; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 32: This amendment is declaratory of existing law to the effect that the term " trade or business " includes the performance of the functions of a public office; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 33: This is a clerical change in a section number; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 34: This is a clerical amendment made necessary by amendment no. 36; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 35: This amendment permits a corporate return to be sworn to by the chief accounting officer in lieu of the treasurer or assistant treasurer; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 36: This amendment eliminates a cross-reference; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 37: This is a clerical change in section numbers in a cross-reference; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 38: This amendment provides that income-tax returns shall be open to public examination and inspection under regulations promulgated by the Secretary and approved by the President. Under the House bill (which is the same as existing law) the returns are open to public inspection only to the extent provided for by rules and regulations promulgated by the President. Subsections (b) and (c) of this amendment restate existing law. The House recedes with an amendment restoring the language of the House bill and adding a paragraph to the effect that every person required to file an income return shall file therewith a statement of the following items shown upon the return: (1) Name and address, (2) total gross income, (3) total deductions, (4) net income, (5) total credits against net income for purposes of normal tax, and (6) tax payable. Such statements or copies thereof are to be available to public examination and inspection in the office of the collector where filed for at least 3 years.

On amendment no. 39: This amendment is a clerical change in a section number; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 40: This amendment is made necessary by Senate amendment no. 77 eliminating withholding at the source in the case of tax-free covenant bonds. The Senate recedes.

On amendments nos. 41 and 42: These amendments make clerical changes in section numbers; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 43: This amendment provides that certain organizations, a substantial part of the activities of which is participation in partisan politics or is carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting to influence legislation, shall not be exempt from the income tax; and the House recedes with an amendment striking out the words "participation in partisan politics or is."

On amendment no. 44: This amendment provides that a farmers' cooperative marketing or purchasing association need only keep such records as will show the actual business done with nonmembers and the profits, if any, derived therefrom, and that exemption shall not be denied on the ground that the record of transactions between the association and nonmembers is not kept on ledger accounts. The amendment also provides that such an association shall be allowed to retain the profits, if any, derived from its business with nonmembers, subject to the right of any nonmember to use his share of such profits, if any, to qualify as a member of the association. Under the amendment, business done for the Federal Government or any of its agencies is not to be considered nonmember business. The House recedes with an amendment inserting in lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment a provision that business done for the United States or any of its agencies shall be disregarded in determining the right to exemption.

On amendments nos. 45 and 124: Amendment no. 45 strikes out the provision in the House bill providing for a tax on personal holding companies, and amendment no. 124 substitutes a surtax on personal holding companies for taxable years to which title I applies. The House bill proposed a tax of 35 percent on the undistributed adjusted net income of such companies. The Senate amendment proposes a surtax of 30 percent on the first $100,000 of such income plus 40 percent on the balance over $100,000. The House bill defined a personal holding company as a corporation 80 percent of whose gross income was derived from rents, royalties, dividends, interest, annuities and gains from the sale of stock or securities, and 50 percent in value of whose outstanding stock was owned by not more than five individuals. As used in the section, the term "royalty" is not intended to include overriding royalties received by an operating company. The House bill also exempted banks and insurance companies from the operation of this section. The Senate amendment omits the word "rents" from the House definition and changes the House exemption so that corporations exempt under section 101, banks or trust companies (a substantial part of whose business is the receipt of deposits) and life-insurance companies and surety companies shall be exempt from the operation of this section. The House bill provided for a deduction from adjusted net income in arriving at undistributed adjusted net income of 10 percent of the adjusted net income. The Senate amendment provides for a deduction of 20 percent of the excess of the adjusted net income over the amount of the dividend deduction allowed corporations for normal tax purposes.

The conference agreement changes this deduction to 20 percent of the excess of the adjusted net income over the amount of the dividends from personal holding companies which are allowable as a deduction for the purpose of the tax imposed by section 13 or 204. The Senate amendment provides for a further deduction from adjusted net income of a reasonable amount used or set aside to retire indebtedness incurred before January 1, 1934. Under the conference agreement the reasonableness of such amount is to be determined with reference to the size and terms of the indebtedness. The Senate amendment omits the provision of the House bill which provided for a deduction in arriving at the adjusted net income of the losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets disallowed as a deduction under section 117 (d). The conference agreement restores this provision of the House bill. The Senate amendment provides for a separate return for the purposes of this surtax on personal holding companies. All provisions of law in respect of the taxes imposed by title I are applicable to this return, except that the foreign-tax credit imposed by section 131 is not allowed. However, the deduction of foreign taxes under section 23 (c) is permitted for the purposes of the surtax even if for the purposes of the corporate tax imposed by title I a credit for such taxes is taken. The Senate amendment adds a provision permitting the corporation to avoid liability in respect of this surtax if all its shareholders include in their gross income their entire pro rata shares, whether distributed or not, of the adjusted net income of the corporation for the year. The House recedes on amendment no. 45. On amendment no. 124 the House recedes with the amendments described above as made by the conference agreement and with a further amendment defining adjusted net income to be net income computed without the allowance of the dividend deduction otherwise allowable minus certain taxes, contributions, and losses specified in the personal holding company section.

On amendment no. 46: This amendment strikes out the provision of the House bill providing for a tax on other corporations improperly accumulating surplus and substitutes a provision providing for a surtax on corporations improperly accumulating surplus. The House bill imposed a tax of 25 percent on the net income of the corporation. The Senate amendment provides for a surtax of 25 percent on so much of the adjusted net income of the corporation as is not in excess of $100,000, plus 35 percent on so much of the adjusted net income as is in excess of $100,000. The term "net income" for the purposes of the House provision was given a special definition. The "net income" as specifically defined in the House bill has the same legal effect as the "adjusted net income" defined in the Senate amendment. Both the tax proposed by the House bill and the surtax proposed by the Senate amendment are in addition to the corporation tax imposed in section 13. The Senate amendment adds to this provision a paragraph permitting the corporation to avoid liability in respect to the surtax if all of its shareholders include in their gross income their entire pro rata shares, whether distributed or not, of the "adjusted net income" of the corporation for the year. The Senate amendment also omits as surplusage the provision of the House bill as to computation, collection, and payment of tax. The House recedes with an amendment making a clarifying change.

On amendment no. 47: The House bill imposed upon citizens or subjects of a foreign country an additional income tax equal to 50 percent of the tax otherwise imposed, if the President finds and proclaims that such country subjects our citizens or corporations to discriminatory taxes. The Senate amendment, instead of imposing an additional tax, doubles the rate of normal and surtax of individuals, and the regular tax on corporations and insurance companies, with a limitation that the tax at such doubled rates shall not exceed 80 percent of the net income. The senate amendment also makes the section applicable in the case of extraterritorial as well as discriminatory taxes. The amendment also omits as surplusage the provisions of the House bill as to computation, collection, and payment of the tax. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 48: This amendment adds language found in existing law, in conformity with Senate amendment no. 62; and the House recedes.

On amendments nos. 49, 50, 51, and 52: These amendments broaden the scope of a reorganization (as defined in the House bill) in connection with which exchanges of property may be made without the recognition of gain or loss. The amendments, in addition to making it clear that mergers and consolidations, as those terms are used in the reorganization definition, are confined to statutory mergers and consolidations, add to the definition of reorganizations the acquisition by one corporation for all or part of its voting stock of (1) 80 percent of the voting stock and at least 80 percent of the total number of shares of all other classes of stock of another corporation, or (2) substantially all the properties of another corporation. To conform to this addition, the definition of "a party to a reorganization" is extended to include both corporations in the type of cases just mentioned. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 53: This amendment makes it clear that if the property of the decedent is sold by the executor or other representative of the estate of the decedent, the basis for computing gain or loss from such sale is the fair market value at the date of death. The House recedes.

On amendments nos. 54, 55, 56, and 57: These are clerical amendments made necessary by the Senate amendments relating to consolidated returns; and the Senate recedes.

On amendments nos. 58 and 59: These are clerical amendments; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 60: This amendment provides that the election of the taxpayer as between percentage depletion for coal mines, metal mines, and sulphur mines and deposits, and depletion otherwise computed, shall be binding in future taxable years on holders of the property who would under section 113 compute their gain from its sale by using the basis of such taxpayer. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 61: This amendment adds language found in existing law, in conformity with Senate amendment no. 62; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 62: This amendment restores the provisions of existing law which exempt from taxation as ordinary dividends distributions of earnings or profits accumulated, or increase in value of property accrued, prior to March 1, 1913; and the House recedes.

On amendments nos. 63 and 64: These amendments add language found in existing law, in conformity with Senate amendment no. 62; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 65: The House bill provided that (except in the case of corporations) only 40 percent of the recognized gain or loss from the sale or exchange of a capital asset should be taken into account in computing net income if the asset had been held for more than 5 years. The Senate amendment provides for 30 percent if the asset has been held for more than 10 years. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 66: The House bill excluded from the definition of "capital assets" property held primarily for sale in the course of the taxpayer's trade or business. The Senate amendment confines the exclusion to property held primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of the taxpayer's trade or business, thus making it impossible to contend that a stock speculator trading on his own account is not subject to the provisions of section 117. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 67: This amendment assures that losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets (to the extent that they are taken into account and are otherwise deductible) shall be allowed in the amount of $2,000, or, if the taxpayer has gains as well as losses from that source, in the amount of $2,000 plus such gains. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 68: This amendment modifies the limitation on capital losses contained in the House bill in the case of incorporated banks and trust companies a substantial part of whose business is the receipt of deposits as follows: If evidences of indebtedness with interest coupons or in registered form issued by a corporation or by a government are sold at a loss, such loss, to the extent represented by the excess of the par or face value of the obligation over the selling price, shall be deductible without regard to the limitation on capital losses, and shall not be taken into consideration either directly or indirectly in applying the capital loss limitation with respect to other capital losses. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 69: This amendment will preclude the contention that gains or losses from short sales of property are not capital gains and losses. Under the House bill the property so sold was in all cases deemed to have been held for 1 year or less, while under this amendment the period for which the property was held will depend in each case upon the actual holding period of the property which is used by the seller to cover his obligation to deliver. The amendment omits the provision of the House bill relative to the treatment of sales or exchanges of privileges or options, since the theatment of such transactions is amply covered by the general provisions applying to capital gains and losses. Finally, under the amendment it is the gains or losses attributable to "the failure to exercise" privileges or options to buy or sell property and not all gains or losses attributable to such privileges or options which are to be treated, as a matter of law and without regard to varying circumstances, as gains or losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets held for 1 year or less. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 70: This amendment provides that dividends from foreign corporations (50 percent or more of the gross income of which was derived from sources within the United States) shall be treated for purposes of section 131, relating to foreign-tax credits, as income from sources without the United States; and the House recedes.

On amendments nos. 71 and 72: The House bill reduced the foreign-tax credit allowed under existing law by limiting the amount of the credit to the proportion of the tax which one half the net income from each foreign source bears to the total income. The Senate amendments restore the provisions of existing law. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 73: This amendment eliminates section 141 of the House bill, permitting the filing of consolidated returns. The House recedes with an amendment restoring the privilege of making a consolidated return (granted by sec. 141 of the House bill) to any affiliated group of corporations each of which is either (A) a corporation whose principal business is that of a common carrier by railroad or (B) a corporation the assets of which consist principally of stock in such corporations and which does not itself operate a business other than that of a common carrier by railroad.

On amendment no. 75: This is a clerical change; and the House recedes.

The amendment also provides that the amounts paid to such individuals shall be reported, and that the Secretary of the Treasury shall submit an annual report to Congress showing the names of the individuals, the amount paid to each, and the name of the paying corporation. The House recedes.

On amendments nos. 93, 94, and 95: These amendments make clerical changes in section numbers; and the Senate recedes.

On amendments nos. 96 and 97: Under existing law, the income from a revocable trust is taxable to the grantor only where such grantor (or a person not having a substantial adverse interest in the trust) has the power within the taxable year to revest in the grantor title to any part of the corpus of the trust. Under the terms of some trusts, the power to revoke cannot be exercised within the taxable year, except upon advance notice delivered to the trustee during the preceding taxable year. If this notice is not given within the preceding taxable year, the courts have held that the grantor is not required under existing law to include the trust income for the taxable year in his return. The Senate amendments require the income from trusts of this type to be reported by the grantor. The House recedes.

On amendments nos. 98, 99, 101, 102, 104, 105, 107, and 108: These amendments carry out in the case of insurance companies the same policy as do amendments nos. 15 and 25 in the case of other corporations. Interest excluded from gross income under section 22 (b) (4) but included in the gross income of an insurance company, is allowed as a deduction from gross income, while interest on partially exempt obligations is allowed as a credit against net income for the purpose of the tax imposed by sections 201 and 204, but not for purposes of surtax. The House recedes on amendments nos. 98, 99, 102, 104, 105, and 107, and recedes on amendments nos. 101 and 108 with amendments making corrections with respect to foreign corporations.

On amendment no. 114: This amendment mades a change in section number. The Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 115: This amendment provides that in computing the 90-day period for filing petitions with the Board of Tax Appeals, legal holidays in the District of Columbia shall not be counted as the ninetieth day. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 116: This is a clerical change. The House recedes.

On amendments nos. 117 and 121: The House bill provided that there should be no statute of limitations in case the taxpayer omits from gross income an amount properly includible therein which is in excess of 25 percent of the gross income stated in the return. Amendment no. 121 strikes out this provision and amendment no. 117 substitutes a period of limitation of 5 years after the filing of the return. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 127: This amendment increases the rates of the additional estate tax imposed by the Revenue Act of 1932 in the case of decedents dying after the date of the enactment of the proposed bill. The House bill did not change existing law in this respect. The rates of existing law begin at 1 percent on net estates not in excess of $10,000 and are graduated by brackets until the portion of a net estate in excess of $10,000,000 is taxed at 45 percent. Under the Senate amendment the rates begin at 1 percent on net estates not in excess of $20,000 and are graduated by brackets until the portion of the net estate in excess of $10,000,000 is taxed at 60 percent. The Senate amendment also reduces the specific exemption of $50,000 allowed by existing law to $40,000. The House recedes with amendments fixing the specific exemption at $50,000 as in existing law, making the first bracket $10,000 instead of $20,000, and making such minor changes in the Senate rate schedule as is necessary because of these two amendments. The following table gives a comparison of the tax under existing law, under the Senate amendment, and under the conference report on net estates of various sizes before the specific exemption is deducted.

[Exemption, present law, $50,000; exemption, Senate amendment, $40,000; exemption, conference report $50,000]

On amendment no. 128: This amendment denies a deduction, for the purposes of computing the net estate subject to the estate tax, for contributions made to organizations, a substantial part of whose activities is participation in partisan politics or is carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting to influence legislation; and the House recedes with an amendment striking out the words " participation in partisan politics or is ".

On amendment no. 133: This amendment makes a technical correction. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 134: This amendment retains the substance of the House provision which authorized a credit or refund of overpayments of taxes paid under prior acts only when found by the Board of Tax Appeals to have been paid within 3 years before filing claim or petition, but rewrites the provision so that the period is 2 years in the case of income taxes and 3 years in the case of gift taxes. The House recedes.

On amendments nos. 135, 136, 137, and 138: These amendments make changes in subsection letters. The House recedes.

On amendments nos. 139 and 140: These are correcting clerical amendments. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 141: This amendment clarifies the House bill to make it plain (1) that, if the interest of the United States in the portion of the property to be discharged from the lien is without value, the collector may, if satisfactory to the Commissioner, release the lien without any payment being made, and (2) that it is not the value of the taxpayer's equity in the property at the time of the discharge but rather the value of the interest of the United States at such time which controls the minimum amount of the payment to be made as a condition precedent to the discharge; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 142: This amendment substitutes for the provision of the House bill which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint not to exceed six assistants general counsel in the Treasury a provision authorizing such appointment by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The amendment also subjects the delegation by the general counsel of his power to any such assistant general counsel to the approval of the Secretary. The House recedes with an amendment providing for the appointment by the President with Senate confirmation only in the case of the assistant general counsel for the Bureau of Internal Revenue and for appointment by the Secretary of the other assistant general counsel.

On amendment no. 143: This amendment substitutes for the House provision which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint 10 assistants in the Treasury, a provision authorizing appointment of 5 such assistants by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The House recedes with an amendment restoring the House provision but reducing the number of assistants to 5.

On amendment no. 146: This is a clerical amendment changing a section number. The Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 147: This amendment provides that petitions filed with the Board of Tax Appeals shall be entitled "In re" followed by the name of the petitioner, and that no substitution of the name of a new commissioner shall be required in proceedings before any appellate court reviewing the action of the Board of Tax Appeals; and the House recedes with an amendment striking out the provision as to the title of petitions, and changing the section number.

On amendment no. 148: This amendment denies a deduction for the purpose of computing the net gifts subject to the gift tax for contributions made to organizations, a substantial part of whose activities is participation in partisan politics or is carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting, to influence legislation; and the House recedes with an amendment striking out the words "participation in partisan politics or is", and making a change in section number.

On amendment no. 149: This amendment limits the liability imposed by existing law upon any executor, administrator, assignee, or other person who pays debts of another or of an estate for which he acts before paying the claims of the United States against such estate or other person to the amount of the payment so made. The amendment applies only to payments made after June 6, 1932, and payments made on or before such date remain subject to existing law. There is no comparable provision in the House bill. The House recedes with an amendment changing the section number.

On amendment no. 150: Subsection (a) of this amendment amends the provisions of existing law which relate to venue of appeals from the Board of Tax Appeals to the Circuit Courts of Appeal or the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia so as to provide for review in the circuit in which is located the collector's office in which the return was filed, or the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia if no return was filed. It further specifically authorizes the Commissioner and the taxpayer to stipulate review by any Circuit Court of Appeals or to stipulate review by the Court of Appeals of the District.

The amendments explained above are applied to all decisions of the Board made on or after the date of the enactment of the act, but not to those rendered before such time, except that the provisions authorizing stipulation of court of review by the Commissioner and the taxpayer may be applied to decisions rendered prior to that time. The House recedes with an amendment changing the section number.

On amendment no. 151: This amendment increases the rates of the gift tax imposed by the Revenue Act of 1932 in the case of gifts made after December 31, 1934. The House bill did not change existing law in this respect. The rates of existing law begin at three fourths of 1 percent on net gifts not in excess of $10,000 and are graduated by brackets until the portion of the net gifts in excess of $10,000,000 is taxed at 33½ percent. Under the Senate amendment the rates begin at three fourths of 1 percent on net gifts not in excess of $20,000 and are graduated by brackets until the portion of the net gifts in excess of $10,000,000 is taxed at 45 percent. The Senate amendment also reduces the specific exemption of $50,000 allowed by existing law to $40,000. The Senate amendment applies the new schedule and exemption only to the taxation of gifts made in calendar years beginning with the calendar year 1935, but, since the gift tax is cumulative, in order to secure the fair result, it is obviously necessary to apply the new schedule and exemption in computing the tax for the years 1935 and following as if the new schedule and exemption had been in force since the time when the gift tax under the 1932 act went into effect. The House recedes with amendments fixing the specific exemption at $50,000 as in existing law, making the first bracket $10,000 instead of $20,000, and making such minor changes in the Senate rate schedule as are necessary because of these two amendments. The following table gives a comparison of the tax under existing law, under the Senate amendment, and under the conference report on net gifts of various sizes before the specific exemption is deducted:

Comparison of gift taxes

[Exemption, present law, $50,000; exemption, Senate amendment, $40,000; exemption, conference report, $50,000]

Net gifts before exemption	Tax
	Present law	Senate bill	Conference report
$50,000		$75.00
$75,000	$337.50	412.50	$337.50
$100,000	1,125.00	1,200.00	1,125.00
$150,000	3,625.00	4,500.00	4,200.00
$200,000	6,875.00	9,000.00	8,700.00
$300,000	14,125.00	19,800.00	19,200.00
$500,000	30,875.00	45,150.00	44,325.00
$1,000,000	85,875.00	128,100.00	126,825.00
$2,000,000	231,875.00	347,500.00	345,825.00
$5,000,000	849,875.00	1,272,450.00	1,269,450.00
$10,000,000	2,296,125.00	3,294,450.00	3,290,700.00
$20,000,000	5,645,375.00	7,793,850.00	7,789,950.00
$50,000,000	15,695,375.00	21,293,850.00	21,289,950.00

To illustrate the computation of the gift tax for calendar years beginning after December 31, 1934, assume that a taxpayer made gifts of $200,000 in 1932, $200,000 in 1933, $500,000 in 1934, and $150,000 in 1935. His gift tax for 1935 in this case would be computed as follows:

(1) Computation under clause (1) of section 502 of Revenue Act of 1932 (computed with schedule of rates and specific exemption provided in conference report) applying to aggregate of gifts made in years 1932 to 1935, inclusive

Total gifts (in 4 years)	$1,050,000
Specific exemption	50,000
Provisional tax (new rate schedule)	136,200
Net gifts	1,000,000

(2) Computation under clause (2) of section 502 of Revenue Act of 1932 (computed with schedule of rates and specific exemption provided in conference report) applying to aggregate of gifts made in years 1932 to 1934, inclusive

Total gifts (in 3 years prior to 1935)	$900,000
Specific exemption	50,000
Net gifts	850,000
Provisional tax (new rate schedule)	108,075

(3) Tax payable on 1935 gift
Provisional tax on aggregate of gifts for 4 years (see par. (1) above)	136,200
Provisional tax on aggregate of gifts for 3 years prior to 1935 (see par. (2) above)	108,075
1935 gift tax (under conference report)	28,125

On amendment no. 152: This amendment strikes out the provision of the House bill which repeals the tax imposed by section 615 of the Revenue Act of 1932 on the sale or use of unfermented fruit juices and substitutes therefor a provision which terminates the entire tax on soft drinks, etc., under that section. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 153: The House bill imposed a tax of 5 cents per pound on the first domestic processing (defined as the first use in commercial manufacture or production) of coconut oil, sesame oil, or combinations or mixtures brought into the United States in chief value of either or both such oils.

This amendment reduces the rate of tax to 3 cents per pound. It also adds palm oil, palm-kernel oil, sunflower oil, perilla oil, imported whale oil, imported fish oil (except cod and cod-liver oil), and imported marine-animal oil to the taxable oils and taxes combinations of the oils enumerated in the section and mixtures containing substantial quantities of any one or more of such oils. Palm oil used in the manufacture of tin plate is exempted from the tax. All taxes collected under the subsection on products of the Philippines are to be held as a separate fund and paid into the treasury of the Philippines, but this provision is to be inoperative if the Philippine government by any law provides for any subsidy to be paid to producers of copra, coconut oil, or allied products.

The House recedes with an amendment which (1) taxes the oils enumerated in the Senate amendment, except sperm oil, perilla oil, and halibut-liver oil; (2) taxes combinations or mixtures containing substantial quantities of taxable oils with respect to which there has been no previous first domestic processing; (3) retains the rate of 3 cents per pound on all the articles taxable, except that an additional tax of 2 cents (making a total of 5 cents) per pound is imposed on coconut oil (and combinations or mixtures containing substantial quantities of coconut oil) unless the oil is the product of the Philippines or other possessions or produced from materials from the Philippines or other possessions, or was in the United States on or before the 30th day after the enactment of the act or produced from materials in the United States on or before the same day, or was contracted for, or produced from materials contracted for, before April 26, 1934; (4) changes the point of imposition of the tax in the case of imported whale oil, imported fish oil, and imported marine-animal oil to the importation instead of the first domestic processing; and (5) provides for payment to the Philippine treasury of taxes collected on coconut oil, and mixtures containing coconut oil, of Philippine origin or produced from Philippine materials.

On amendment no. 154: This is a clerical amendment. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 155: This amendment is a clarifying amendment making certain that the credit or refund of the vegetable-oil tax applies only when the article into which the oil has gone is to be used by the State or political subdivision in the exercise of an essential governmental function. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 156: This amendment corrects a clerical error. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 157: This amendment makes the subsection of the vegetable-oil tax providing for covering collections therefrom into the Treasury of the United States consistent with the policy of covering the proceeds of such taxes on Philippine products into the Philippine treasury in certain circumstances. (See amendment no. 153.) The House recedes.

On amendment no. 158: The House bill amended sections 601 (c) (1) and 617 of the Revenue Act of 1932 in the following respects:

(1) Manufacturers and producers of gasoline or lubricating oil were required to register and give bond.

(2) The provisions for tax-free sales between manufacturers or producers and to dealers for resale to manufacturers or producers or for resale to States or political subdivisions thereof, were made inapplicable to gasoline and lubricating oil, and the provision for tax-free sales of benzol for non-motor-fuel uses was eliminated. Provision was made for credit of tax paid on gasoline or lubricating oil upon a showing that the gasoline or lubricating oil had been used in the manufacture or production of an article on which tax was paid under title IV of the Revenue Act of 1932, and for credit of tax paid on benzol sold and used for a non-motor-fuel use.

(3) The sentence imposing the gasoline tax was amended by the express inclusion of sales by the producer as well as by the importer or any producer.

(4) The definition of producer of gasoline was narrowed by the elimination of dealers selling exclusively to producers.

(5) The definition of gasoline was broadened to include all naphtha and to include all liquids prepared, advertised, offered for sale, or sold for use as, or used as, fuel for the propulsion of motor vehicles, motor boats, or airplanes, regardless of the chief use.

The Senate amendment completely rewrites the section with the following effect:

(1) The provisions for registration and bond are retained, with an added provision empowering the Commissioner to revoke the registration (and right to buy tax-free) of any manufacturer or producer guilty of tax evasion.

(2) Tax-free sales of gasoline and lubricating oil are continued as under the present law.

(3) The amendment making it clear that the tax applies to all sales by the producer is retained and a further amendment is made to subsection (b) to provide that any person who has purchased gasoline tax-free by virtue of the exemption of sales to a producer shall be regarded as the producer of such gasoline.

(4) The present definition of producer of gasoline is retained.

(5) The definition of gasoline in the House bill is liberalized by the exemption of any product (not commonly or commercially known or sold as gasoline) specifically sold for a non-motor-fuel use.

(6) A provision is added authorizing inspection of records, returns, etc., with respect to Federal gasoline or lubricating oil tax by State officers and the furnishing of information therefrom to such officers.

The House recedes with an amendment which makes the change in the definition of gasoline and the requirements of registration and bond effective 30 days after the enactment of the act instead of the first day of the next month.

On amendment no. 159: The House bill imposed a tax on the production of crude petroleum at the rate of one tenth of 1 cent a barrel, payable by stamp. This amendment rewrites the section to provide for imposition of the tax on sale by the producer, the tax to be withheld or collected by the purchaser and paid over by him to the United States. In cases where the producer himself removes the petroleum from the place of production or disposes of it otherwise than by sale, the producer is required to return and pay the tax. The provision for transferring the buden of the tax in the case of existing contracts has been eliminated. An exemption is inserted excepting crude petroleum produced from any well which is not capable of producing more than 5 barrels per day. The effective date is made the thirtieth day after the date of the enactment of this act. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 160: This amendment inserts a provision requiring persons handling, transporting, storing, or dealing in crude petroleum to make returns required by regulations. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 161: This amendment strikes out the provision of the House bill requiring the vendee under contracts existing on the date of enactment of the act to pay the petroleum refining tax instead of the vendor. The House recedes.

On amendments nos. 162, 163, 164, and 165: These amendments make changes in subsection letters. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 166: This amendment postpones the effective date of the section imposing tax on refining of petroleum to the thirtieth day after the enactment of the act. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 167: This amendment strikes out the provision of the House bill which advances the date of expiration of the check tax from July 1 to January 1, 1935. The Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 168: This amendment impresses taxes collected or withheld with a trust in favor of the United States and makes applicable for the enforcement of the Government's claim the administrative provisions applying to the assessment, collection, and payment of taxes. There is no comparable provision in the House bill. The House recedes with an amendment changing the section number.

On amendment no. 169: This amendment exempts articles sold for less than $75 by the manufacturer, producer, or importer after the date of the enactment of the act from the tax under section 604 of the Revenue Act of 1932 on articles made of fur on the hide or pelt, or of which such fur is the component element of chief value. There is no comparable provision in the House bill. The House recedes with an amendment changing the section number.

On amendment no. 170: This amendment exempts articles sold for less than $25 by the manufacturer, producer, or importer after the date of the enactment of the act from the tax under section 605 of the Revenue Act of 1932 on jewelry and similar articles. There is no comparable provision in the House bill. The House recedes with an amendment changing the section number.

On amendment no. 171: This amendment amends the provisions of existing law taxing cigarettes so that it will be certain that long cigarettes which are capable of being cut into several standard cigarettes may not pay tax as single cigarettes, by inserting a provision taxing at the rate of $3 per thousand cigarettes of more than 6½ inches in length, counting each 2¾ inches or fraction thereof as a single cigarette. There is no comparable provision in the House bill. The House recedes with an amendment changing the section number.

On amendment no. 172: This amendment increases the existing excise tax on fancy wooden matches and wooden matches having a stained, dyed, or colored stick or stem from 2 cents per thousand to 5 cents per thousand. There is no comparable provision in the House bill. The House recedes with an amendment changing the section number.

On amendment no. 173: This amendment reduces the existing stamp tax on contracts for future delivery of produce from 5 cents per $100 of value to 1 cent per $100. There is no comparable provision in the House bill. The House recedes with an amendment making the rate 3 cents per $100, and changing the section number.

On amendment no. 174: This amendment inserts a provision terminating on June 30, 1934, the tax on the use of both foreign- and domestic-built boats. The House recedes with an amendment changing the section number.

On amendment no. 175: This amendment amends the existing law imposing internal-revenue taxes on distilled spirits by authorizing a rebate or refund of tax of 90 cents per gallon when the spirits are used in industry or the arts in making articles not fit for intoxicating beverage purposes. There is no comparable provision in the House bill. The Senate recedes.

On amendment no. 176: This amendment inserts a provision which exempts from the tax under section 613 of the Revenue Act of 1932 candy sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer after the date of the enactment of the act. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 177: This amendment provides for a capital stock tax, quite similar to the capital-stock tax temporarily imposed by the National Industrial Recovery Act. The tax is an excise tax for the privilege of carrying on or doing business as a corporation for each year ending on June 30. Insurance companies and corporations exempt from income taxes are exempt from the capital-stock tax. The first year to which the tax applies is the year ending June 30, 1934, the tax applying only to corporations carrying on or doing business during such year on or after the date of the enactment of the pending bill. For the first year the tax is measured by the value of the capital stock as declared by the corporation as of the close of its last taxable year ending on before June 30, 1934. The value of the capital stock having been declared for the first year, such value may not be subsequently amended. A reasonable original declared value is assured by means of the excess-profits tax which is based on the relation of the net income of the corporation to such declared value. The rate of the capital-stock tax is $1 per thousand dollars of the declared value.

The basis for the capital stock tax for subsequent years ending June 30 is arrived at by making certain adjustments to the original declared value. The adjusted declared value of the capital stock of a corporation for subsequent years is the original declared value plus (1) the cash and fair market value of property paid in for stock or shares, (2) paid-in surplus and contributions to capital, (3) its net income, and (4) the amount of the dividend deduction allowable for income-tax purposes, and minus (A) the value of property distributed in liquidation to shareholders, (B) distributions of earnings or profits, and (C) the excess of the deductions allowable for income-tax purposes over its gross income. These adjustments are to be made for each income-tax taxable year included in the period from the date as of which the original declared value was declared to the close of the taxpayer's last income-tax taxable year ending at or prior to the close of the year for which the capital stock is imposed. Each of these adjustments is to be computed on the basis of what a separate income-tax return (whether or not such a return was filed) should have shown for each of the taxable years included in the period mentioned.

In the case of a foreign corporation the capital-stock tax is for the privilege of carrying on or doing business as a corporation in the United States and is measured by the adjusted declared value of the capital employed by it in the transaction of business in the United States.

The House recedes with an amendment providing for the addition to the declared value of tax-exempt income.

On amendment no. 178: This amendment provides for an excess-profits tax on every corporation for each income-tax taxable year ending after the close of the first year in respect of which it is taxable under the capital-stock tax imposed by the pending bill. The primary purpose of this tax is to induce corporations automatically to declare a fair value for their corporate stock for capital stock purposes. The rate is 5 percent on the portion of the net income (computed as for income-tax purposes) in excess of 12½ percent of the adjusted declared value of the stock of the corporation as of the close of the preceding income-tax taxable year. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 179: This amendment has the effect of terminating the capital stock tax and excess-profits tax imposed by the National Industrial Recovery Act as to certain periods with respect to which the pending bill imposes similar taxes. The House recedes.

On amendments nos. 180 and 181: These are clerical amendments; and the House recedes.

On amendment no. 182: This is a change in the section number; and the Senate recedes.

On amendments nos. 183 and 184: These are changes in section numbers; and the House recedes.

DISAGREEMENTS

The committee of conference have not agreed on the following amendments of the Senate:

On no. 1: Being the table of contents of the bill.

On no. 13: Providing an increase in the rate of tax for 1934.

R. L. DOUGHTON,
SAMUEL B. HILL,
THOS. H. CULLEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, in this revenue measure about 185 amendments were put on the House bill by the Senate. The conferees of the House and Senate have agreed upon all these amendments except Senate amendments nos. 1 and 13.

Amendment no. 1 is the table of contents and is purely more clerical.

Amendment no. 13 is the so-called "Couzens amendment", which imposes a 10-percent supertax upon the total normal and surtax which the individual taxpayer pays under the permanent tax set-up and is only for the year 1934. We are going to take up amendment no. 13 at a later time, but I simply wanted the House to understand that the supertax or the so-called "Couzens amendment" is not involved in the conference report. We will have separate discussion and separate consideration of amendment no. 13, which is in disagreement between the conferees of the House and the conferees of the Senate. So in voting upon the conference report you are not voting upon this provision seeking to impose this supertax of 10 percent.

As I have said, there were 185 amendments imposed on the House bill by the Senate. I may say that approximately 175 of these amendments are purely clerical or clarifying amendments that do not in any substantial way modify the provisions of the bill as it passed the House, and I feel that the Members of the House are not concerned with these clarifying and clerical amendments. There are a number of amendments, however, which are of concrete interest to you, and I shall briefly touch upon them.

The Senate amended the House bill as to surtaxes by imposing a greatly increased rate of surtax in the lower brackets. The House conferees refused to recede upon this amendment except upon the basis of a greatly reduced rate in lieu of the Senate rates.

The Senate amendment would have imposed upon the taxpayers an additional $28,000,000 over the House bill, through increased rates in the brackets from $10,000 to $25,000. The House conferees accepted the amendment with the modification that these rates be reduced more nearly to the level of the House rates, so that the lower brackets did not receive the shock of the increase and, as modified, will raise $9,000,000 additional to the House bill instead of $28,000,000.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Between what brackets does this $9,000,000 additional come?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman is speaking of the Senate rates?

Mr. SNELL. I mean in the final agreement.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The rates agreed upon which would produce $9,000,000 additional will get that money in the brackets above $50,000.

Mr. SNELL. Has there not been an increase all the way down to $4,000 in the final agreement; that is, there is an increase over the House rates all the way from $4,000 up?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The House rate commenced at 4 percent on the first $4,000 and the agreed rate commences at 4 percent on $4,000 to $6,000, the same as the House rate; that is, the House rate was from $4,000 to $8,000 at 4 percent, and the agreed rate is 4 percent from $4,000 to $6,000.

Mr. SNELL. So that all the lower brackets pay an increased income tax under the agreed bill.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. No. The agreed rates are slightly higher than the House rates, but 2 percent lower than the Senate rates in the lower brackets, but the taxes in the lower brackets are not increased thereby for the reason that the limitation for earned-income deduction was raised from $8,000 to $14,000.

Mr. SNELL. But more than was in the House bill and more than was in the previous law?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The conference report up to $9,000 increases the amount of money collected under the House rates by $1 only.

Mr. SNELL. By 1 percent?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. One dollar.

Mr. SNELL. As I look at the report, it increases them a good deal more than that.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Under the House bill on a $9,000 net income of a married man, with no dependents, the tax would be $328, and under the rates agreed to in conference the tax would be $329.

Mr. SNELL. But as I look over the report which was published there is practically 1 percent increase from $6,000 to $18,000 or $20,000 of income.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman will bear in mind that we also raised the limit on earned income from $8,000 to $14,000; that is, we agreed upon a $14,000 limitation on earned income in lieu of the $8,000 that the House bill carried.

Mr. SNELL. That may be, but I had special reference to the increases on regular incomes. They were increased about 1 percent in the medium brackets.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. But the amount of money paid is not increased.

Mr. SNELL. Of course, that would depend upon where the income came from or whether it was earned income or other income.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman from Washington allow me to read from the prepared table in answer to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes; but I hope the gentleman will not take up too much time.

Mr. TREADWAY. I have the table before me and from $8,000 to $9,000 the amount paid under the act of 1932 was $232.35, as passed by the House it was $232.24, as passed by the Senate it was $250.54, and under the conference agreement it is $231.44. Therefore the conference agreement is 0.39 percent less at the $9,000 bracket than the present law, and the increase comes above $9,000.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes; that is according to the composite table.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; the experience table of the Treasury.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That answers the gentleman's question, I think.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. On page 16, I read this in the report:

> The rates proposed in these lower brackets add 1 percent to the House rates, except in the first bracket covering surtax net incomes of $4,000 to $6,000, in which case the rate is 4 percent as in the House bill.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is true.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the conferees on the part of the House accepted the Senate amendment as to increase of estate taxes with an amendment that the exemption be raised from $40,000 to $50,000. In other words, we restored the $50,000 as it stands in existing law.

Then the rate of estate taxes was graduated up to the maximum of 60 percent after we reach the $10,000,000 mark.

The gift-tax rate follows the course of the estate tax and lifts the exemption for the gift tax to $50,000, restoring it from $40,000 as it was lowered by the Senate amendment. The gift-tax rate starts at three quarters of 1 percent and reaches a maximum of 45 percent above $10,000,000.

The next important item is consolidated returns. You will recollect that the House passed a bill providing for consolidated returns, and with the provision that in the case of affiliated groups making consolidated returns they would pay an additional 2 percent on the net income, or 15¾ percent on the net income instead of 13¾ percent. The conferees agreed to the Senate amendment abolishing consolidated returns with the exception that affiliated railroad corporations are still permitted to file consolidated returns.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman tell us in a word why railroad corporations should have that advantage over other corporations? Is there any reason why a railroad corporation should be excepted any more than telegraph and telephone companies?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. A number of States require railroad corporations operating through the State to incorporate within that State, and railroads are obliged to comply with the State law. In addition to that we have Federal regulation of railroad corporations. With this combined handicap of affiliated railroad corporations in making separate returns, the conferees felt they ought to be exempted from the provisions requiring separate returns.

Mr. SNELL. There are many small banks or branches all owned by the same corporation, and they are regulated by the Federal Government.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I will say that most of the ordinary business corporations can, if they want to do so, reincorporate so as to include all their branches under one corporation and make returns as one corporation.

Mr. SNELL. Not as I understand this bill. I really cannot see any great difference.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I will.

Mr. McFARLANE. Section (b)—I am wondering if that clearly abolishes or leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It abolishes them except in affiliated groups of railroads.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman will remember that the original House bill provided for a tax on crude oil. Have the conferees agreed to retain that in the bill?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. They agreed to keep it in, but it is modified to some extent.

Mr. BAILEY. The idea is still there.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. You have agreed to it in conference?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes. It was only a question of a tax.

Mr. BAILEY. And there is no way to get it out except to vote down the conference report?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is correct.

Mr. HASTINGS. The conference report does not increase the tax over the House provision?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. No; it is the same amount of tax, but we do exempt wells which do not have a capacity of more than 5 barrels a day.

Publicity in tax returns is another important item that was involved in the conference. As a result of the conference upon the question of the publicity of tax returns, the Senate amendment was stricken out and the present law left intact, with an addition to the present law agreed upon by the conferees; and I shall read the explanation of that contained in the statement, which is probably a little more lucid than the language of the act itself. I read from page 19 of the statement of the conferees:

> This amendment provides that income-tax returns shall be open to public examination and inspection under regulations promulgated by the Secretary and approved by the President. Under the House bill (which is the same as existing law) the returns are open to public inspection only to the extent provided for by rules and regulations promulgated by the President. Subsections (b) and (c) of this amendment restate existing law. The House recedes with an amendment restoring the language of the House bill and adding a paragraph to the effect that every person required to file an income return shall file therewith a statement of the following items shown upon the return: (1) Name and address, (2) total gross income, (3) total deductions, (4) net income, (5) total credits against net income for purposes of normal tax, and (6) tax payable. Such statements or copies thereof are to be available to public examination and inspection in the office of the collector where filed for at least 3 years.

That is an addition to existing law; and existing law, as the Members of the House know, provides not for full publicity of tax returns but does provide that certain committees of Congress may have access to tax returns for examination and for report thereon back to Congress. For instance, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House or the Committee on Finance of the Senate, or a special committee of the House appointed for that purpose, or a special committee of the Senate appointed for that purpose, or a joint committee of the House and Senate, may have access to these returns, so the conferees felt that contrary to general opinion there is very ample opportunity now for inspection of these returns. But in addition to that we provided as indicated here, and as I have read from the statement.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. There is no provision in the present law where the public in general can go to these tax returns and get them and publish them in a newspaper, is there?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. No.

Mr. SNELL. Or anything of the kind?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. No.

Mr. SNELL. But this lays everything wide open to the sordid-minded people in any community to go and look up your tax return and publish it.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. They get only the totals.

Mr. SNELL. And that is really all that they care for.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is all they get.

Mr. SNELL. And that is all they care about. They want to know how much you earn in your business, and so forth.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. They do not get how much you earn in your business.

Mr. SNELL. They get the total amount; and if you are a lawyer, that is where you earn your money.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. You get the gross income made from earnings and investments and otherwise.

Mr. GOSS. They get the net income.

Mr. SNELL. And they can find out how much you have, and that is all the sordid-minded people want to know.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I do not yield for a speech. I appreciate the gentleman's attitude.

Mr. SNELL. In a word, will the gentleman tell us what argument the Senate used to convert the House conferees to their position?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman knows that the Senate had a wide-open publicity clause; and we thought we had gained quite an advantage for the protection of the things that the gentleman is standing for, when we got this particular amendment to the Senate amendment, and we believe we have given the people what they may be entitled to know, and yet have not jeopardized the rights and the interests of the taxpayer.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman has the idea that the public is entitled to know all of that, that is all right, but a great many people disagree with that idea.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The Senate had that idea.

Mr. SNELL. I know, but I asked the gentleman what argument was offered to convert the House conferees.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Oh, we converted the Senate; they did not convert us to anything.

Mr. SNELL. Oh, the House conferees have given in to the Senate in almost everything, and everybody knows it.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, as I have said, the supertax comes up under a separate vote, and I do not want anyone to get that confused with this conference report. The Senate did impose amendments repealing certain excise taxes, including taxes on soft drinks, on candies, on furs up to $75, and on jewelry up to $25, and the House conferees concurred in those amendments, so that they go out of the tax bill.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman please return to amendment numbered 38. I read:

Such statements or copies thereof shall, as soon as practicable, be made available to public examination.

Does that mean that the statements filed and also the copies are for public examination, or just the copies of those few items?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The statements; yes.

Mr. BLOOM. That is the entire tax return?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. No. This little statement that is in amendment numbered 38 is open to public inspection, but not the tax return.

Mr. BLOOM. If the gentleman will kindly read the language, he will see that it provides for both the statement and the copies.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. If you want to buy a copy of it, certainly you have a right to; but you can see the original statement.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman is saying "yes" and "no" to my question.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman is not confusing the statement with the tax return, is he?

Mr. BLOOM. I am not confusing anything. I am taking the language of the amendment with reference to amendment numbered 38, as asked for by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. This says the statement and also the copy.

Mr. McFARLANE. Or copy.

Mr. BLOOM. And/or.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It may be that under that language the Treasury Department, with the approval of the President, may make a regulation that they may have the copies only, but you can have one or the other. If you do not get the original, you get a copy.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman answer this question? Can he have both?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It says "or."

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I think if the gentleman will examine this a little more carefully, he will reach the conclusion that this is a fair statement of the situation created by this provision, that there is to be filed a statement, with the man's income-tax return, giving the information provided in this provision.

Mr. BLOOM. I understand that.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Now, the statement referred to is what the copy refers to further in this same provision. In other words, in simple application it amounts to this: A man files a statement with his income tax, giving six items—his name, the total gross income, the total deductions, net income, total credits against net income for purposes of normal tax.

Mr. BLOOM. That is a specified thing that you are supposed to get in that report—those six things.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. BLOOM. Now, is it permissible that any person can go further than that and look at the income-tax return of the individual as well as this?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. No. That is the very reason for providing this.

Mr. BLOOM. Then do you not think this report should be changed?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. No. There is no necessity for that. In its simple application it means this: When a man's income-tax return is filed, a statement accompanies that, giving those six items. I assume in the administration of the provision, the Treasury Department will simply tear off that statement or detach it from his tax return and will hold those statements available for inspection in some given part of the Treasury Department, and it is entirely separate from his income-tax return.

Mr. BLOOM. The last 3 lines do not say that and do not mean that, because the last 3 lines say that the statement or reports are available.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The statement is what is available, not the tax return at all.

Mr. BLOOM. It reads:

Such statement or copies thereof are to be available for examination and inspection in the office of the collector where filed for at least 3 years.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That simply means that a copy of this statement may be available for this purpose.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield further on this, but I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Amendment 169 exempts $75 worth of furs. Amendment 170 exempts $25 worth of jewelry. Why the difference?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is all they asked for, I presume. Up in the northern countries furs is a matter of necessity, whereas jewelry may not be so considered.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a further statement explaining the conference report in detail.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Let me call the attention of the House to certain details in explanation of the conference report. The Senate added 185 amendments to the House bill. This is a smaller number of amendments than was made in the Senate in connection with the Revenue Act of 1932, when the Senate amendments numbered 270. This is also in spite of the fact that the revenue bill of 1934 resulted from a complete analysis and study of the income-tax law with the object of closing all possible loopholes to tax avoidance. Out of the 185 amendments made by the Senate, approximately 135 may be termed as "clerical, perfecting, or minor amendments." Of these minor amendments, the House receded on 87; the Senate receded on 41; and the House receded with an amendment in 7 cases. It is, of course, inevitable that in the case of perfecting amendments the House would make more recessions than the Senate. There are about 50 amendments made by the Senate which are of substantial character or have a bearing on the more important provisions of the bill. Mathematically speaking, the House receded on 18 of these 50 amendments, although in 8 cases out of these 18 amendments the Senate changes are merely perfecting amendments to important new provisions made by the House in respect to existing law. The Senate completely receded on 5 important amendments. With reference to 25 of the amendments of a substantial character, a compromise was reached, or, technically speaking, the House receded with an amendment. In the case of 2 amendments the conference report is in disagreement. I will now take up what I consider to be the substantial amendments in order and make a few brief remarks in regard to each.

Amendment no. 2: The House conferees refused to accept this Senate amendment, which increased the surtax upon all taxpayers with net incomes up to and including $32,000. The Senate amendment would have imposed an additional tax burden of $28,000,000 upon taxpayers. We prevailed upon the Senate conferees to accept a compromise by which this tax burden is increased by only $9,000,000 over that contained in the House bill. Under the compromise the surtax rates proposed by the Senate are decreased in the case of net incomes up to and including $18,000. The rates in these lower brackets add 1 percent to the House rates, except that rate on incomes between $4,000 and $6,000 remains at 4 percent, the rate in the House bill. An example will show the effect of the conference rates. In the case of a married man with no dependents and with an earned income of $16,000, the tax under existing law amounts to $1,140; under the House bill, $993; under the Senate bill, with the 10-percent increase, $1,326.60; under the Senate bill, without the 10-percent increase, $1,206; and under the conference compromise, $1,044.

Amendment no. 13: This amendment increases everybody's tax for 1934 by 10 percent. We refused to accept this amendment, and it is now in disagreement.

Amendment no. 14: We persuaded the Senate conferees to agree to the provision of the House bill taxing annuities. They agreed to waive their amendment exempting annuities of $500 or less.

Amendment no. 19: We also obtained a substantial concession on this amendment. The Senate denied a deduction for contributions made to certain organizations, a substantial part of the activities of which was participation in partisan politics or carrying on propaganda or otherwise attempting to influence legislation. We were afraid this prohibition was too broad, and we succeeded in getting the Senate conferees to eliminate organizations, a substantial part of the activities of which was participation in partisan politics. Similar concessions were made in amendments nos. 43, 128, and 148, relating to corporations exempt from the income tax and to the allowance of deductions for contributions in the case of estate and gift taxes.

Amendments nos. 17 and 20: These amendments restore existing law, which permits banks to deduct from their gross income interest paid on deposits invested in tax-exempt securities. Your conferees came to the conclusion that the House provision, which denied a deduction in such cases, might seriously hamper the marketing of Government securities and be exceedingly difficult to administer. For the same reason, we agreed to Senate amendment no. 20, which allows to banks and other taxpayers deductions allocable to tax-exempt interest.

Amendment no. 24: The House bill provided a maximum earned income of $8,000. The Senate bill increased this to $20,000. We succeeded in getting a compromise of $14,000 as the maximum earned income.

Amendment no. 29: The Senate conferees tried to get us to agree to this amendment which reduced the tax on the transfer of certain installment obligations. We refused, and the Senate conferees finally agreed to withdraw this amendment.

Amendment no. 38 (publicity): We reached a compromise on publicity of income-tax returns. Under the Senate amendment the President was required to open all income-tax returns for public inspection. This would lead to serious abuses, as it would disclose trade secrets and weaken the value of returns as evidence in litigation, and in addition cause the Treasury considerable administrative difficulties and expense. We got the Senate conferees to accept a compromise provision which requires each taxpayer to file with his return a statement showing (1) his name and address, (2) his total gross income, (3) his total deductions, (4) his net income, (5) his total credits against net income for the purpose of normal tax, and (6) his tax payable. This statement is to be made available for public inspection in the collector's office.

Amendment no. 44: This amendment provided that farmers' cooperative marketing or purchasing associations (1) need not keep ledger accounts of transactions with nonmembers and (2) that the nonmembers may purchase memberships with profit from nonmember business and (3) business done with the Federal Government or its agencies shall not be considered nonmember business. The Senate withdrew the first two points upon advice from the Treasury that they were already covered by existing law. On the third point, we got the Senate conferees to agree to put in a provision to the effect that business done with the United States or any of its agencies shall be disregarded in determining whether the association is entitled to exemption from income taxes.

Amendments nos. 45 and 124: The Senate also accepted our provisions levying additional taxes upon personal holding companies, with slight modifications. It was thought unfair to compel real-estate companies with heavy mortgage indebtedness to distribute earnings accumulated to meet this indebtedness. The Senate excepted "rents" from this provision. The Senate also permitted a deduction for a reasonable reserve for indebtedness incurred prior to January 1, 1934. We agreed to these and other minor changes made by the Senate.

Amendment no. 46: This amendment deals with the additional penalty imposed upon corporations which accumulate surplus to avoid the payment of surtax by their shareholders. With the exception of certain technical amendments, this provision is in the same form as the provision in the House bill. We agreed to these technical changes.

Amendment no. 62: We could not get the Senate conferees to accept the provisions of the House bill taxing dividends paid out of pre-March 1, 1913, surplus and were forced to accept this amendment, which continues the exemption which is allowed under existing law.

Amendments nos. 65 and 67: The Senate also accepted the provisions of the House bill, providing for the treatment of capital gains and losses, except that an additional bracket was added in the case of assets held for more than 10 years. In such cases only 30 percent of the gain or loss is taken into account, instead of 40 percent as provided in the House bill. The Senate also provided for the allowance of capital losses up to $2,000, even though the taxpayer had no capital gains against which to offset them. This took care of the small taxpayer whose only capital transaction was an occasional sale of property. We thought these changes were fair and agreed to the Senate amendments.

Amendment no. 68: We accepted the Senate amendment allowing banks to deduct losses on bonds sold below par against their ordinary income. This is another amendment which it was thought necessary to insure the marketing of Government securities, which are purchased for the most part by banks.

Amendments nos. 71 and 72: The Senate conferees refused to accept the provisions of the House bill which cut the foreign tax credit allowed by existing law in half. It was pointed out that to do this at this time would seriously interfere with the development of American trade abroad and that, under existing law, the credit cannot reduce the tax on American income but only upon foreign income which is subject to heavy taxation abroad. We were forced to agree to these amendments, which restored existing law.

Amendment no. 73 (consolidated returns): The Senate abolished consolidated returns. We persuaded the Senate conferees to agree to an amendment permitting railroads to file consolidated returns. It was felt that an exception ought to be made in the case of railroads, as they are forced to incorporate separately in each State and are under Federal supervision.

Amendment no. 77: We also got the Senate conferees to withdraw this amendment, which eliminated the requirement of withholding at the source in the case of tax-free covenant bonds.

Amendment no. 92: This amendment requires corporations to submit with their returns a list of the names of all officers and employees who receive more than $15,000 a year, and requires the Secretary of the Treasury to report such information annually to Congress. We thought this was a good way to help protect the minority stockholders and agreed to the amendment.

Amendment no. 96: It was found that many taxpayers were avoiding surtaxes by creating trusts in favor of their families which trusts could only be revoked by an advance notice given to the trustee prior to the beginning of the taxable year. This amendment closes up this loophole by taxing such income to the grantor of the trust. We thought this a good way to stop this sort of tax avoidance and agreed to the amendment.

Amendments nos. 117 and 121: Under the House bill, if a taxpayer omits more than 25 percent of his gross income from his return, the statute of limitations on assessments will remain open indefinitely. It was pointed out that this might be unfair in the case of a taxpayer who makes an honest mistake. For instance, he might report the income in a wrong year or he might fail to report a dividend because he was advised by the officers of the corporation that it was paid out of capital. Accordingly, your conferees agreed to the Senate amendment providing for a 5-year statute in such cases.

Amendment no. 126: Your conferees agreed to this amendment exempting from the estate tax real estate located abroad. It was pointed out that it is an established international principle to tax real estate only in the country where situated.

Amendment no. 127 (estate tax): The Senate bill increased the estate-tax rates on an average about 40 percent, and decreased the exemption from $50,000 to $40,000. We agreed with the rate increase but got the $50,000 exemption of existing law restored.

Amendments nos. 142 and 143: These amendments relate to the provisions in the House bill providing for the creating of a general counsel for the Treasury Department, assistant general counsel, and assistants to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Senate agreed substantially to the House provision except that the assistant general counsel for the Bureau of Internal Revenue is to be confirmed by the Senate and the number of assistants to the Secretary was reduced from 10 to 5 upon the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury that 5 would be sufficient. We agreed to these Senate changes.

Amendment no. 145: The hot-oil provision of the House bill providing for payment of rewards to informers, which was stricken out by the Senate, was restored at our insistence.

Amendment no. 151 (gift tax): The Senate increased the gift tax rates so that they were three fourths of the estate-tax rates and reduced the exemption from $50,000 to $40,000. We accepted the increase in rates but had the exemption restored to $50,000.

Amendment no. 152: The House bill repealed the tax on unfermented fruit juices. This amendment repeals all the taxes on soft drinks, which now have to compete with beer and other liquors. We agreed to this amendment, which will cost us about $5,000,000.

Amendment no. 153: On coconut oil we reached a compromise. The House bill levied a tax of 5 cents per pound upon the first domestic processing of coconut and sesame oil. The Senate reduced the rate of tax to 3 cents a pound and added palm oil, palm-kernel oil, sunflower oil, perilla oil, imported whale oil, imported fish oil (except cod and cod-liver oil), and imported marine-animal oil. Palm oil used in the manufacture of tin plate was exempt and the taxes on such products from the Philippines were paid into the Philippine Treasury instead of that of the Federal Government unless the Philippine Government provided a subsidy to producers of copra, coconut oil, or allied products.

The compromise (1) taxes the oils enumerated in the Senate amendment, except sperm oil, perilla oil, and halibut-liver oil; (2) taxes combinations or mixtures containing substantial quantities of taxable oils with respect to which there has been no previous first domestic processing; (3) retains the rate of 3 cents per pound on all the articles taxable, except that an additional tax of 2 cents (making a total of 5 cents) per pound is imposed on coconut oil (and combinations or mixtures containing substantial quantities of coconut oil) unless the oil is the product of the Philippines or other possessions or produced from materials from the Philippines or other possessions, or was in the United States on or before the 30th day after the enactment of the act or produced from materials in the United States on or before the same day, or was contracted for, or produced from materials contracted for, before April 26, 1934; (4) changes the point of imposition of the tax in the case of imported whale oil, imported fish oil, and imported marine-animal oil to the importation instead of the first domestic processing; and (5) provides for payment to the Philippine treasury of taxes collected on coconut oil, and mixtures containing coconut oil, of Philippine origin or produced from Philippine materials.

Amendment no. 167: The Senate struck out the provision of the House bill eliminating the check tax as of January 1, 1935. At our insistence, the Senate conferees agreed to restore this provision of the House bill.

Amendments nos. 169 to 174: On the excise taxes, we agreed to the following changes made by the Senate:

First. Exempting from the fur tax articles sold for less than $75.

Second. Exempting from the jewelry tax articles sold for less than $25.

Third. Increasing the tax on colored matches from 2 cents to 5 cents per thousand.

Fourth. Taxing long cigarettes of more than 6½ inches in length by counting each 2¾ inches or fraction thereof as a single cigarette.

Fifth. Restoring the capital-stock tax and excess-profits tax which were enacted under the National Industrial Recovery Act.

Sixth. Repealed the tax on the use of boats, which was bringing in very little revenue and raised certain treaty objections.

Amendment no. 173: The Senate wanted to reduce the tax on contracts for future delivery of produce from 5 cents per $100 of value to 1 cent. We compromised on this by reducing the tax to 3 cents.

Amendment no. 175: The Senate tried to put in a provision taxing distilled spirits for industrial purposes. We finally succeeded in getting the Senate conferees to abandon this amendment because of the many administrative difficulties involved.

Amendment no. 176: We agreed to this amendment repealing the tax on candy. This will cost us only about $4,000,000.

In conclusion, I wish to submit, without reading, a statement showing the estimated additional revenue from the bill for the fiscal year 1935 and for a full year of operation:

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question first?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield for a question.

Mr. BOYLAN. I should like to ask about amendment no. 153. The House receded and agreed to it with an amendment. Then follows an amendment that, in my opinion, it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to interpret.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. What amendment does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. BOYLAN. Amendment 153, relative to the oil tax. Can the gentleman tell us something about that? There is an involved amendment there.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Well, we put a 3-cent tax on coconut oil—that is, on the first processing of coconut oil—that comes from the Philippine Islands and other possessions of the American Government. We put a 5-cent processing tax on coconut oil that comes from countries outside of American possessions and the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BOYLAN. Well, you go farther. You pay back to the Philippine treasury——

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. We pay to the Philippines the revenues that we get from the processing tax on the coconut oil imported from the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BOYLAN. That seems to me to be a most peculiar kind of amendment.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is a law similar to the excise tax on cigars which come from the Philippine Islands. For 30 years that has been the law.

Mr. BOYLAN. We act as a collecting agent for the Philippines, and then we pay it over to them. Is that the procedure?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is true. We collect the money and pay it back to the Philippine Government.

Mr. BOYLAN. It seems to me it would be very much involved. I think it should be simplified.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does the gentleman not believe that under the 3-cent tax or the 5-cent tax there will be very little money paid into the Treasury as the result of this law?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is probably true. That is the hope of the dairymen, I will say.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does the gentleman realize that the Philippine Islands purchase more dairy products from our people than any other nation in the world. You are destroying their purchasing power.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I have no information on that.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The committee has so drafted this amendment that the coconut oil produced in the Philippine Islands will have a decided advantage over oil from the rest of the world. In other words, we give them a 4-cent per pound preferential duty in this bill. So far as the Philippine Islands are concerned, they are taken care of.

Mr. McDUFFIE. What is it selling for now? Is it not less than 3 cents?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We know that coconut oil will be consumed in this country to a certain extent and the Philippine oil will have that market.

Mr. McDUFFIE. We do not know that. Japan may take over this soap industry. This means a tariff embargo in the guise of a tax.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Our Government, through the A.A.A., is levying a processing tax on our farm products, hogs, cotton goods, and thereby on the oils that come in competition with imported oils from the Philippines. We return the tax collected on coconut oil and manufactured tobacco to the Philippine treasury. This oil tax is not adverse to the Philippine people, but like all our legislation touching those islands gives to them an especial benefit by guaranteeing to them a protected American market.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question with regard to the tax on coconut oil?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. BOYLAN. Instead of collecting the tax and then paying it over to the Philippine government, would it not be far better to exempt Philippine oil from duty?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is, of course, a controversial question which we cannot decide here. I might have my opinion and the gentleman might have his opinion.

Mr. BOYLAN. That is the effect of the amendment, is it not?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. We could not in conference make such a change as the gentleman from New York suggests.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from New Jersey begins, may we not have an understanding with regard to time? The gentleman has consumed 30 minutes. Are we to have 30 minutes on the minority side?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I have used 30 minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I understood that we were to have 30 minutes on the minority side.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, why would it not be a better proposition to ask unanimous consent that time for consideration of the conference report be extended to 2 or 3 hours?

Mr. SNELL. We tried to do that earlier in the day, but were not successful.

Mr. TREADWAY. We had an agreement with regard to time. I did not understand that the gentleman from Washington wanted to control the entire half hour on this side. I expected, of course, to have yielded to the gentleman from New Jersey exactly the time the gentleman from Washington has yielded to him.

Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Washington whether, after the gentleman from New Jersey concludes his statement, I shall have 20 minutes under my control?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. No; but I will yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] to be used by him, or I will yield a total of 20 minutes to such gentlemen on his side of the House as the gentleman from Massachusetts may designate. Let the gentleman from New Jersey proceed. The gentleman knows I wish to be fair.

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly, I realize that; but it was my understanding that we would have 30 minutes on this side under my control.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, I must refuse to yield until I finish my statement.

I call attention to the fact that the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, prior to our conference, stated that the conferees proposed to stick by the bill as it passed the House.

It has been my privilege to serve a number of times as a member of the conference committee on revenue legislation, but this is the first time that I have refused to sign the report of the conferees.

I have taken this attitude because I am not in sympathy with the provisions of the act as it comes from the conference committee, for it represents practically a complete surrender to the Senate on the part of the House. This is evidenced by the fact that the House receded on some twenty-odd of the more important amendments made by the Senate, while the Senate receded in not more than a half dozen, compromising on about 10 or 12 others.

You will remember that a special subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee was appointed in the last session for the purpose of making a special study of our revenue laws, with a view to plugging up the leaks, and so forth. This committee labored over a period of 8 or 9 months and made a report to the full committee when we met in December, making certain recommendations and suggestions to be incorporated in the new revenue act, many of which were written into the bill as passed by the House.

We were told, and the country was assured, that there was not to be any increase in taxes or any new taxes, but instead additional and sufficient revenue would be raised by plugging up the holes through which the rich and the wealthy taxpayers were escaping payment of their just taxes.

As far as I can see, the holes which our special committee told us were in our tax laws and should be plugged up are still in the act as it comes back to us from the Senate and the conference committee. Our taxes have been substantially increased in many instances, and practically no attention has been paid to the recommendations of the Ways and Means Committee as embodied in the House bill.

The bill as adopted by the House, which inflicted no new taxes other than the import tax on coconut oil, would provide additional revenue estimated at $258,000,000 in a full year of operation. Under the act as agreed to in conference, the estimated revenue, exclusive of the so-called "Couzens amendment" for an additional 10-percent super income tax, will be $417,000,000, and the difference between these two amounts represents new and additional taxes added by the Senate and agreed to in conference.

If the Couzens amendment, upon which you will be given an opportunity to vote today, is accepted by the House, it will add an additional $55,000,000 to our tax burden, bringing the total estimated revenue under the new bill up to $472,000,000. We were told by the Senate conferees that this additional revenue to be raised by new taxes was made necessary by reason of the passage of the independent offices appropriation bill over the President's veto, increasing Government salaries and increasing compensation and pension payments to our war veterans. Let us just analyze this for a moment: The independent offices bill, as enacted into law, carries increases to veterans in the amount of $76,712,000 and for wages for Government employees $90,000,000, a total of $166,712,500.

To meet that increase in current expenditures, the distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol increase our Federal tax burden by $214,000,000 over and above the increase in revenue under the House bill.

As a matter of fact, the bill as adopted by the House already provided approximately $100,000,000 over and above the cost of increasing veterans' allowances and Government salaries, not considering the savings that will accrue to the Government, estimated at $125,000,000, by the adoption of the independent offices bill.

The bill passed by the Senate was not the handiwork of the Senate Finance Committee; it was written on the floor of the Senate and bears little or no resemblance to the bill reported to the Senate by the Finance Committee. You of the majority party cannot claim this as a Democratic bill, and I am sure that when its provisions become known to the taxpayers you will be glad to deny its parentage. The Republican members of the conference committee, with the exception of one, have refused to sign the conference report. We voted consistently against most of the Senate amendments. Your conferees have signed this report, and your party must accept the responsibility for this legislation by reason of the action of your conferees.

I do not know if anyone will have the temerity to get up here and advocate the acceptance of the Couzens amendment; if so, no doubt it will be pointed out to you that this supertax of 10 percent is only a temporary proposition and is good only for 1 year. I have been here going on 20 years and have seen a number of bills come in here with vicious legislation disguised as 1-year propositions, and the RECORD will bear me out when I say that there has been very little legislation placed on our statute books for 1 year that has not been continued from year to year thereafter. We have a sample of this right in this bill; the capital-stock tax carried in the Industrial Recovery Act was to be repealed with the repeal of prohibition. The House did not incorporate that tax in the House bill, but lo and behold, we find it put back in the bill by the Senate because it is an easy tax to collect. It is easy to write new taxes into a law, but it is quite a different thing to repeal them.

I have not the time to go into all the important amendments added by the Senate and agreed to in conference, but I want to touch on a few of them.

You have heard much about consolidated returns. The House bill continued the filing of consolidated returns but increased the penalty from 1 percent to 2 percent for that privilege. The Senate amendment prohibited the filing of such returns; the conference committee in effect accepted the Senate amendment, reserving the privilege of filing consolidated returns to railroads but to none other.

Why an exception should be made only in the case of railroads is a little beyond my comprehension. The Treasury officials, who are charged with the responsibility of administering the law, are in favor of continuing the filing of consolidated returns, and asked for no change in the law in this respect. I prefer to follow the advice of the tax experts of the Treasury Department in matters of this sort and, therefore, opposed both the Senate amendment and the conference compromise.

Publicity of tax returns: I am unalterably opposed to the Senate amendment and the conference compromise. In my opinion, there is absolutely no need of this new legislation. Under the present law the President has authority to open tax returns for inspection to such an extent as he may deem advisable, and Congress has authority to review tax returns at any time.

The compromise agreed to by the conferees, in my opinion, is as bad as the amendment itself. Under it every taxpayer must file with his return a little card showing the total amount of gross income, total deductions, net income, total credits against net income, income subject to normal tax, total tax before credits against tax, and the tax payable.

It is practically a duplication of one's tax return; we know that few people are able to make out their own tax returns and they will have as much difficulty in making out the little card which must be attached to the return.

If the taxpayer fails to make out the card, the Government will do it for him, to make sure that his neighbor will have an opportunity to snoop around and find out all about one's private affairs, and for this assistance the Government will charge the taxpayer $5. It is a ridiculous proposition on the face of it, and I predict that it will come back to plague its sponsors.

Under the agreement reached by the conferees the lower brackets of the income-tax schedule have been increased beyond necessity, while the rates in the upper brackets and the estate tax are practically confiscatory.

Just when the country is supposedly starting to get on its feet and we have the assurance of the Democratic administration that prosperity is not just around the corner, but has definitely arrived, a monkey wrench is thrown into the machinery by bringing out a tax bill that, in spite of the assurances given to the country that there would be no increase in Federal taxes, substantially increases the general tax burden by putting additional levies not alone upon business and industry but also upon the masses of thrifty individuals who were hoping for relief.

I realize that there is little possibility of having this conference report voted down, but I hope that the House, at least, will sustain the action of its conferees in refusing to accept the Couzens amendment.

I am taking the time of the House merely to point out the fact that the Republican members of conference, with the exception of one of the Senate conferees, refused to concur in the more important amendments made by the Senate to the House bill and vote against their acceptance.

We lay the responsibility for this bill as it goes to the President for signature upon the doorstep of the Democratic administration, where it properly belongs.

ITEMS IN REVENUE BILL ON WHICH THE HOUSE AND SENATE, RESPECTIVELY, RECEDED, AND THOSE WHICH WERE COMPROMISED

House receded: Capital-stock tax, excess-profits tax, estate tax, gift tax, tax on colored matches, abolition of consolidated returns (except as to railroads), capital gains and losses (additional bracket), exemption of dividends out of pre March 1, 1913, earnings, restoration of full credit for foreign taxes, termination of soft-drink tax, fur tax (exemption of articles up to $75), jewelry tax (exemption of articles up to $25), termination of boat tax, termination of candy tax, allowance of capital net loss up to $2,000, exemption of bond losses of banks from capital-loss limitation, enlargement of tax-free reorganization provisions, report to Congress on compensation of corporate officers and employees, personal holding companies (revision), administration of gasoline and lubricating-oil taxes, revision of provisions relating to tax on production of crude petroleum.

Senate receded: Expiration of check tax, reduction of tax on nonbeverage alcohol (leaving rate at $2), withholding in case of tax-free covenant bonds, proposed exemption from tax of annuity payments up to $500, awards to informers ("hot oil").

Compromised: Income-tax rates, earned-income credit, publicity of returns, tax on oils and fats, tax on sales of produce on exchange, General Counsel for Treasury, assistants in Treasury, nondeduction of contributions to propaganda organizations, exemption of farmers' cooperatives (extension).

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHARACH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. I want to get straightened out on some of the statements the gentleman made, especially as to the vote. That was on the consolidated returns?

Mr. BACHARACH. I could not say whether it was on the consolidated returns or not.

Mr. McFARLANE. I think it was. They refused to reconsider that vote by a vote of 58 to 18.

Mr. BACHARACH. I understand from my colleague from California that that statement is not quite correct, but it is immaterial. The point is that the Ways and Means subcommittee worked here for 8 or 9 months, and they might just as well have stayed home for the amount of good that was done over there. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the discussion of this conference report may be extended 30 minutes beyond the original 1 hour.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not want to intrude on the gentleman's program here, but we asked for an extension of time and the gentleman declined our request before the session opened this morning and declined it during the session. I do not think it is fair now, after I have told the Republican Members that there was no time available, for the gentleman to come in with a last-minute request for an extension of time.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. How much time does the gentleman desire to be yielded?

Mr. TREADWAY. I presume I have all the rest of the time.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] 20 minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is understood I may yield the 20 minutes to anyone I see fit?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It is not so understood.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is not willing that I should yield any part of the 20 minutes to Republican Members on this side?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I will yield to whomsoever the gentleman from Massachusetts designates.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that time ought to be controlled by the leader of the minority on this side. However, I thank the gentleman from Washington for giving me this brief time to make a statement.

We have had a publicity law covering tax returns in the State of Wisconsin for many years. The belief there has been that it enables the people as a whole to determine whether certain taxpayers were trying to avoid payment of their taxes either as to amount or as to their general character. That question has been asked here. I do not know what influenced the conferees or what influenced the Members of the Senate, but I do know that publicity has had no adverse effect in Wisconsin. We find in Wisconsin that it has not been hurtful but helpful in tax enforcement. I offered an amendment to that effect in committee, which was defeated when this bill was before our committee.

So far as Wisconsin is concerned, I believe it has been a good thing, and publicity prevents tax evasion. It is framed here so that the restriction will not be harmful, and I do not think it will expose the taxpayers to the danger suggested in the inquiry. Based on the experience of Wisconsin, it is a good amendment and rightfully retained by the conferees.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what can be said in 4 minutes on a bill as important as this huge tax bill. However, I desire to make just a few observations.

The State of New York pays about 33 percent of the Federal income tax, therefore we will pay about 33 percent of this bill, which further increases the burden of taxation. I presume that we will pay a good deal more, because the higher brackets have been raised, most of which come from the State of New York, and it may well be that we will pay 50 percent of this particular bill, owing to the heavy increases in the higher brackets of both the income- and estate-tax payers.

The reason for the bill, of course, is the gigantic expenditures by the Federal Government. May I point out that since 1929 the rich income-tax payer, the fellow in the higher brackets, has almost disappeared, and yet we are endeavoring to tax him more in this bill. I predict we will not get very much in the way of returns. In 1929 there were 38,889 people in this country who had taxable incomes of $50,000 or more a year.

In 1932 this had been reduced to 7,431.

In 1929 there were 513 people who had incomes of over $1,000,000.

In 1932 there were 20 people in the United States who had incomes of over $1,000,000.

I am not opposing estate-tax legislation, because it is a fair and equitable tax and cannot be dodged. Death is inevitable for both rich and poor alike. When the rich die they cannot take their money with them, and that is one time when you can levy taxes upon them that no loophole or lawyer can prevent. But you cannot levy taxes in the highest brackets on the big income-tax payers, because they are naturally going into tax-exempt securities, and until you pass a tax-exempt security amendment the men of great wealth in this country will put their fortunes in such securities and thus avoid paying a 60-percent tax to the Federal Government and 15 or 20 percent more to local governments, such as municipalities, counties, towns, and so forth. This bill amounts to confiscation of wealth and is a virtual capital levy. Everybody realizes it, and the bill will not bring in the returns you expect.

Today is May Day and all over this country in the industrial cities the communists and the socialists and the ultraradicals are denouncing our free institutions, both economic and political, and saying that everything is wrong and rotten and corrupt in America and that we are ruled by rich men and controlled by Wall Street.

I want to say in answer to this that there are very few rich men left today in the United States. I have just read the figures showing there are only 20 men who have a million-dollar income, whereas there were 513 in 1929. That indicates that the distribution of wealth has already been largely effected. When we get through with this legislation there will be none at all and our friends, the communists and the socialists, then will not have anything to talk about.

The main thing they say is wrong with America is that 57 rich men control the Congress and the Government and rule our industrial system. We know this is not a fact, but this being May Day I want to point out that we are increasing the taxes on the rich and we are also trying to pass a stock exchange bill, and when we do both of these things, then the communists and the socialists will not have anything left to talk about. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Washington yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry I cannot agree with the report of the conferees in some respects.

I consider that in a depression, when we are trying to get private business back into its normal stride, it is very unwise to impose unnecessarily high tax burdens which, instead of assisting and inspiring business, will have a deflationary effect. If there is any time when Congress should be careful about the imposition of taxes, it is during conditions such as exist now.

We are putting through legislation for the purpose of increasing the price level—some call it inflation—and at the same time we are passing a tax measure which is purely deflationary in its effect and in its character. This is an inconsistent position.

Reference has been made to the publicity feature involved in this measure. It is nothing but a snooping proposition. The American public does not want publicity on tax returns that will prove harmful in its nature. We had it in 1861, when the first income-tax law was passed to raise revenue to help bear the burdens of the Civil War, and it was repealed in 1862. Public opinion demanded its repeal. Congress passed it again in 1909, and again an aroused public opinion compelled its repeal in 1910. In 1924 an amendment providing for publicity, much milder than the provision proposed by the conferees, was passed, and either in 1925 or 1926 an aroused public opinion again compelled Congress to repeal such legislation. It was simply used by business competitors, by stock salesmen, and others in an abusive way.

There is one State in the Union that has publicity so far as State income-tax returns are concerned—the State of Wisconsin. Every other State in the Union has a provision against publicity, against the activities and enterprises of business men being ascertained by competitors, against the results of unnecessary, unwise, or pitiless publicity. It is absolutely unnecessary on tax returns made by our citizens.

I am opposed to it because it is destructive. There is nothing progressive about such legislation. It is destructive in its character and in its effects.

The repeal of consolidated returns with the exception of railroads is unjustifiable. If it is justifiable to permit consolidated returns with respect to railroads, it is perfectly justifiable, in my opinion, to permit same with reference to other corporations. This is no time to disturb the efforts of private business in its return to normalcy by such legislation.

I realize this privilege has been abused, but we should curb and regulate and control the abuse. We should not undertake to try to remove the abuse by completely eliminating the proper and legitimate use of anything, and that is what the Senate undertook to do when they put this amendment in the bill on the floor of the Senate, and what we are undertaking to do today.

The conferees have had a difficult task, but as I look this report over, it is practically on all major propositions a complete surrender on the part of the House conferees to the amendments that were put on in the Senate, not by the Senate Finance Committee, but written into the bill on the floor of the Senate.

This bill started out as a bill to eliminate tax evasions. The Senate changed it into a bill providing for new taxes, deflationary and harmful, and I hope that the features I have referred to, if the conference report is defeated, will be eliminated. I realize, of course, the difficulty of defeating the conference report and the probability that it will be agreed to, but I cannot restrain myself from expressing my views on at least these two important matters. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], has made a good deal better speech in opposition to the conference report than I am capable of making, and I congratulate him on his remarks. He is absolutely correct in saying that the House yielded to the Senate all down the line on important amendments. It is a Senate floor measure and not a Finance Committee measure. The important items were included in the bill on the floor of the Senate. I think it is important to have this fact in mind when Members come to vote on the conference report.

To prove that statement, let me call your attention to a few figures. We were extremely liberal in the House, and the bill left the House with an estimated yield of $258,000,000. It went to the Finance Committee of the Senate, and when reported by the Finance Committee of the Senate it called for a yield of $330,000,000.

It went from the hands of the Finance Committee to the floor of the Senate, and when the Senate got through with it, with all these various obnoxious amendments, it called for a yield of $480,000,000.

It is true that the bill before you today is estimated to produce $417,000,000. You can calculate for yourselves whether the House Ways and Means conferees rewrote the bill increasing it $160,000,000 or whether the Senate Finance Committee rewrote the bill increasing it over $80,000,000, or whether the men in control of the Senate—and I could name them if parliamentary procedure permitted—wrote this bill.

It is therefore absurd to claim that the House conferees were successful in their support of the House measure. I can see but one reason for the adoption of the conference report. I naturally am not in the confidence of the administration. If the majority of the conferees have been informed that the administration wants that amount of money taken from the taxpayers of the country, I assume that it will be adopted. But if that sum should be collected, the country is entitled to know it as well as the three House conferees on the part of the majority.

The only real merit in the bill is the fact that if the administration wants it, of course it will be adopted.

There has been very little in the open about this bill. It was extremely difficult for the House subcommittee to secure any information whatever, but eventually we were provided with the services of a very efficient gentleman from the Treasury Department in the person of Professor Magill.

A very different procedure was followed by the administration in the preparation of this bill from that adopted in the preparation of the so-called "reciprocal tariff bill." When that bill was under consideration we were flooded with professorial, doctrinaire opinions of departmental assistants, who endeavored to enlighten us with the theoretical views they hold. But when practical information was wanted about the needs of the Treasury it was not at our command.

I know of no time in our history when reduction of taxes would be more desirable than now, when we are endeavoring to put new life into industry. For those who have interests in industry to be confronted with additional burdens of taxation can have but one result, namely, the destruction of initiative and incentive.

In confirmation of this I quote the following editorial from the Berkshire Evening Eagle, of Pittsfield, Mass.:

KILLING THE GOOSE

A declaration is made in Washington that the new revenue bill will lay an additional burden of $200,000,000 on business—an alarming prospect. Here is something definite and tangible to think about. Already it is staggering beneath its load. From one of the most important companies in the country comes a dividend check of 19 cents! Up to now it has been $5. This is the tax story told by a service company nearer home: 1928, $56,266; 1929, $59,648; 1930, $62,671; 1931, $84,974; 1932, $94,170; 1933, $98,567. Upward, upward, ever upward. We have much to fear from the ever-increasing cost of government. There will have to be a showdown and an answer one of these fine days. Business ought to be encouraged, not throttled.

At this point let me quote an extract from a letter which I received this morning from a taxpayer in Massachusetts as emphasizing the effect which this legislation is bound to have on our citizens:

My own wonder is that there has not been a unanimous refusal, concerted, to pay any more taxes anywhere at any time. Such a taxpayers' strike is inevitable either by design or actual inability to pay anything and live, or both. Personally I prefer the direct method of refusal before pauperism forces the indirect way. The enclosed editorial from this morning's Boston Herald says the same thing in better but not less direct words. Government spending must stop and quickly. * * *

No "brain trust" can work anything diametrically opposed to natural phenomena. Old Mother Nature will run her business, equalizing things in her own inimitable way, and no "brain trust" will swerve her one iota from her course, which has been made sufficiently plain through the ages past.

The editorial referred to above follows:

[From the Boston Herald of Apr. 30, 1934]

A VICIOUS POLICY

Business, trade, and commerce must be brought into Boston from the outside and even from far beyond its boundaries and beyond the State and country as well. A vicious policy of waste, extravagance, and high taxes has driven people and business not only to other cities and towns but outside the State. The nonresidents doing business here would be forced out by the imposition of an occupational tax on nonresidents to Boston's great loss. (Mayor Mansfield.)

His honor could have gone a great deal further without overstating the truth. He could have said that most of the taxes proposed in citi hall, the statehouse, and the Capitol at Washington are plus propositions. That is, they do not usually offset other charges. They do not lighten the burden on real estate. They hit the poor as hard as the rich.

Our heavy State income tax, the poll tax which was utilized for a time to finance old-age pensions, the new revenue from liquor licenses, the gasoline taxes which were designed originally for highway building and improvement only—have these improved the condition of the wage earner who owns a home, or the corporation which has heavy realty holdings, or the merchants of Boston, or the thousands who are on their pay rolls?

The upward march of taxes is one answer. Increased borrowings are another. Default in payments of real estate taxes is another. Poverty appeals to Washington are another. Requests for a decrease in appraisals are another. The proposed occupation tax on non-Bostonians, which would add to the load which they are already carrying in their home communities, is still another. It is a grotesque suggestion. Unfortunately, ideas just as damaging have been put on the books. Once there, they usually remain. It is easy enough to legislate them on. It is almost impossible to get them off.

"Why, we Americans don't know what taxation is", say students of the problem and those who have been abroad. Well, we are learning. If the present trend continues, we shall go even beyond our foreign brethren. The figures issued recently by the national industrial conference board indicate this clearly enough. An article yesterday in the New York Times by P. W. Wilson, entitled "Our Tax Burden Nearly as Heavy as Britain's", makes the same point.

These records show that the ratio of taxation to national income has gone up in England from 23 to 25.7 percent; in Germany from 19.3 to 25.2 percent; in the United States, from 11 percent in 1926 to 20.3 percent in 1932. The new deal will accelerate the movement upward. "The comparisons", says Mr. Wilson, "upset important assumptions formerly taken for wranted. Britain is still the most heavily taxed country. But the difference in this respect between her and other countries, especially the United States, is not what it has been assumed to be. The United States on ratio to national income is almost as highly taxed as Germany and four fifths as highly taxed as Britain in 1931."

The remedy for the accumulating evil is discernible, but legislators fear to adopt it. They devise new exactions and authorize freak borrowings, but stubbornly refuse to economize to the extent necessary. What the mayor characterizes as a "vicious policy of waste and extravagance" continues in most places. Remove them, and improvement will be expedited. Go on with them, and the consequences will be disastrous.

Ultimately, taxpayers all over the country would strike in such numbers that the combined military forces of the Nation and the States would be powerless. That is the history of most popular uprisings. The motives which induced them are just as powerful under the new deal as ever before.

Mr. TREADWAY. The House bill was estimated to produce $258,000,000, which was several millions more than the administration asked for. The main object of the bill was to stop legal loopholes which had developed in the administration of the law. The Senate bill, which was the basis of the conference, goes far beyond these stopgaps and places an entirely unnecessary burden on the taxpayers. It is estimated to produce $480,000,000, or $222,000,000 more than the House bill. I see no reason for this tremendous tax levy when indications are pointing to business recovery.

Reference has been made to these various additions. I think they constitute ample reasons why the conference report should be voted down.

Another reason is the provision for publicity of returns. That has been tried under a previous law and found to be a dismal failure, and it was therefore repealed. There is no reason why every individual should see every other man's income-tax return unless it is for the purpose of blackmail or snooping around and getting information they are not entitled to. Congressional committees can secure them now. The Finance Committee of the Senate, the Ways and Means Committee of the House, or any authorized committee of Congress can have every tax return brought to their open door.

Now, the N.R.A. Act of last year had inserted in it a provision which I will read. Section 218 provides:

SEC. 218 (h) Section 55 of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a semicolon and the following: "And all returns made under this act after the date of enactment of the National Industrial Recovery Act shall constitute public records and shall be open to public examination and inspection to such extent as shall be authorized in rules and regulations promulgated by the President."

By what more authority do you want the right to see tax returns than to get your permission from the President of the United States?

Reference has been made to the fact that the State of Wisconsin has a provision in its income tax law for publicity of returns. In this connection I wish to point out that the Wisconsin State Tax Commission, in its annual report for 1930, severely criticized this provision. The report states:

There have been no instances where public inspection has brought forth unreported income, and as to its anticipated effect in producing more correct returns experience has shown that it has had the opposite effect.

* * * * * * *

A survey shows that public examination is almost wholly without any public motive or significance but that advantage is taken of it to serve purely private and personal interests.

Consolidated returns is another subject of great interest. What are the facts in connection with it? The House committee and the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate, everybody, up to the time the vote was taken on the floor of the Senate, favored consolidated returns. The Treasury Department included, but the Senate was allowed to take out consolidated returns, and all that was saved from the wreck finally in the conference was permission for the railroads to file consolidated returns. Is there any good reason why railroads should not take their position alongside of any public-service corporation that is regulated by the laws of the State or the Nation? Why should not public utilities be granted the same rights as the railroads are? The whole subject matter is so unfair that this report should be voted down on that ground also.

I agree with numerous changes that the conferees made in some of these nuisance taxes. If I had supposed that there was any such tremendous sum going to be added to this conference report, I should have favored taking off further taxes of that nature. They reach directly to the people, and the people find great fault with taxes of that nature. If we had supposed that any such thing as this was to be added to this bill in this conference, certainly there would have been proposals to remove others, but we were hamstrung within the limits of the conference, and we could not make those changes.

The only item of any large sum that the House conferees accepted freely and without any discussion whatever was that of the capital-stock and excess-profits taxes, which will raise $95,000,000. I consider that was a breach of good faith. The excess-profits tax and the capital-stock tax were put in the National Industrial Recovery Act last year to finance the $3,300,000,000 public-works program, and it was distinctly agreed and provided in the law that when the eighteenth amendment was repealed those taxes should go off. Yet the very first opportunity to put them back on, they go back on. They were temporary taxes, purely temporary, but they now become permanent; and that is an indication of the method that we can expect to see carried out all through these so-called "temporary emergency propositions" in all of the legislation which we have passed within the last year. You will find a demand to make these features permanent not only in the tax bill but in all the so-called "recovery acts", and this is a good illustration of it.

The income-tax schedule I personally approve, and was very glad to find that we could reach an agreement whereby the lower brackets were given fair and just treatment.

They are increased above what I should like to see up to $20,000, but that was part of the general program of fair advancement, and so we can continue through all of these items.

The estate tax has been referred to. When you get up to 60 percent in an estate tax, where there is necessarily not available cash to pay such a tax, it practically means confiscation. Possibly that is a fair way to distribute the wealth of the country, but nevertheless it does bear the element of confiscation. I hope the conference report will be voted down.

Never was there less information available to Congress or to the public. I assert that the people are beginning to wake up to the fact that we cannot run a government on faith or through evolution or experimentation. It must be done on the basis of sound business and financial judgment.

Such a bill as this will shatter faith, deprive industry of confidence, and lead to chaotic conditions. Bear in mind in voting for this conference report that this is not the total amount of internal-revenue tax. This is a brand-new tax on top of that contained in existing law.

If the Democratic Party wants to assume the responsibility for taking $417,000,000 more out of the pockets of our citizens for the sake of paying for extravagant experiments in government, that is their look-out. As one elected Representative responsible to the voters of his district, I refuse to do so.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Now, let us examine a little into the details of the conference report. This measure was originally conceived as a bill to prevent avoidance of existing taxes. The Ways and Means Committee gave no thought to reporting out a general revenue bill. We advocated no new taxes but simply endeavored to get all that was coming to the Government under existing levies. As the bill comes back to the House from the conference, what do we find? We have what amounts to a general revenue revision. If the Ways and Means Committee had originally proposed a general revision, we no doubt would have given thought to the elimination of the existing nuisance taxes, if we had at the same time proposed increasing existing levies and imposing new ones. As it is, we have both.

INCOME TAXES

Under the House bill, we gave substantial relief to the smaller taxpayer having income from salaries and wages, and at the same time increased the tax somewhat on those having incomes from dividends and partially tax-exempt interest. The Senate felt that the smaller taxpayers were not entitled to the relief which we had given them and increased the tax in the lower and middle brackets. The conference rates are a compromise between the two views. Personally, I can see no justification for the increase over the House bill.

At this point I will include a table showing how the average taxpayer in each income bracket will be affected by the different schedules. This table is based upon the experience of the Treasury Department as regards the proportion of the net income of taxpayers in the various brackets, which is from salaries, wages, and so forth, and that which is from dividends and interest. Tables showing the tax applicable to earned incomes, or to income from dividends, do not present a true picture of the effect of the changes upon the average taxpayer.

The table is as follows:

Total normal tax and surtax after earned-income credit on average incomes as reported for 1932 by net incomes of $5,000 and over, under H.R. 7835 as passed by House and as passed by Senate (before 10-percent additional tax) and under proposal of Apr. 23, 1934, each as compared with total normal tax and surtax under 1932 act

ESTATE-TAX INCREASE

Mr. TREADWAY. The present estate tax imposes a maximum levy of 45 percent. This is increased to 60 percent under the conference agreement.

There are many who feel that the present estate tax is about as far as we ought to go in redistributing wealth through taxation. In many cases the property depreciates between the date of death, when the tax is imposed, and the time of distribution, and by the time the taxes are paid the heirs have very little left. Without some provision guaranteeing against virtual confiscation of estates, I cannot support the increased rates provided in the conference report.

CONSOLIDATED RETURNS

The conference agreement provides for the abolishment of consolidated returns except as to railroads. The House bill provided for the continuation of the privilege of filing such returns but increased the penalty from 1 perecent to 2 percent. The Senate Finance Committee supported the House provision, but the entire section was stricken from the bill on the Senate floor.

The action of the conference committee in favoring the Senate action, except as it would affect the railroads, overrides the considered views of the Ways and Means Committee, the House of Representatives, the Senate Finance Committee, and the Treasury Department.

PUBLICITY OF RETURNS

The amendment relating to publicity of returns is also a Senate amendment which was inserted on the floor of that body, without consideration by the Finance Committee. The conference agreement is a modification of the Senate amendment and is intended to satisfy those who desire to snoop into their neighbor's affairs.

The Ways and Means Committee of the House, the Finance Committee of the Senate, and the Joint Committee on Taxation—all have the power under existing law to inspect income-tax returns, and there is absolutely no reason for throwing returns open to the inspection of persons who have no business with them.

DIVIDENDS OUT OF PRE-MARCH 1, 1913, EARNINGS

The House has several times included in revenue bills a provision removing the exemption in favor of dividends declared out of corporate earnings or profits accrued prior to March 1, 1913. The Senate has always eliminated the House provision, and the item has gone out of the bill in conference. There is absolutely no justification for the exemption, and the Supreme Court has upheld the power of Congress to tax such dividends. Therefore, I cannot agree with the majority conferees in yielding to the Senate on this provision.

FOREIGN-TAX CREDIT

The House bill reduced the credit for foreign taxes paid by citizens and domestic corporations doing business abroad to one half the present allowance. The Treasury Department, the State Department, and the Department of Commerce—all advocated the retention of the present law as a mean of encouraging our foreign trade. The conference agreement restores the full credit.

TAX ON CHECKS

Under existing law the tax on checks expires July 1, 1935, The House bill moved the expiration date up to January 1, but the Senate eliminated this provision. The conference agreement restores the earlier expiration date. This was one of the few items on which the Senate yielded.

I should have been glad to see this tax repealed at once, as it is one of the most objectionable of the nuisance taxes and doubtless has a tendency to discourage the use of checking accounts, thereby keeping money out of the banks.

TAXES ON SOFT DRINKS AND CANDY

The House bill repealed the tax on unfermented fruit juices, and the Senate struck out the entire soft-drinks tax, together with the tax on candy. The conference agreement retains both these Senate amendments, with which I am in hearty accord.

TAX ON JEWELRY

The conference agreement retains the Senate amendment exempting from the tax on jewelry all articles of jewelry (including clocks) sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer for less than $25. While I should have been glad to see this tax repealed in its entirety, I am glad to support the Senate provision.

TAX ON FURS

The conference agreement also retains the Senate amendment exempting from the tax on furs all articles of which fur is the component material of chief value, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer for less than $75. This tax was particularly objectionable, because it applied to many low-priced garments which were simply trimmed with fur. As long as the fur on the garment was more valuable than any other component material, the article was subject to the tax. As most women's coats have some fur on them, the levy amounted to a tax on cheap clothing.

CONCLUSION

While I am in sympathy with many of the provisions of the bill, I am unable to vote for the adoption of the conference report. I have been a conferee in connection with a number of revenue bills, but this is the first time I have not signed a conference report. I realize that it is impossible to get a bill which is satisfactory to each of us, or which satisfies any one person in every particular, but the objectionable features of the present bill so far outweigh its good features that I cannot give it my support.

I voted for the bill as it was passed by the House, and I could even vote for the bill as it was reported to the Senate by the Finance Committee. The present bill, however, was written on the floor of the Senate by a handful of so-called "Progressives", and did not have consideration and study by either the Finance Committee or the Ways and Means Committee. If a general revenue bill is to be written, let it originate in the Ways and Means Committee in accordance with the constitutional injunction that all revenue bills must originate in the House of Representatives. Let the House have an opportunity to express itself directly upon the subject of new taxes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. I reserve the right to object. On what subject?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Upon the conference report.

Mr. SNELL. I am sorry, but I shall have to object to that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SNELL) there were—ayes 81, noes 62.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote upon the ground that there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The roll call is automatic. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 253, nays 106, not voting 71, as follows:

THE TAX BILL

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate amendment no. 13 be now considered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 13 of the bill, insert the following:

"SEC. 14. INCREASE OF TAX FOR 1934

"In the case of an individual the amount of tax payable for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1933, and prior to January 1, 1935, shall be 10 percent greater than the amount of tax which would be payable if computed without regard to this section, but after the application of the credit for foreign taxes provided in section 131, and the credit for taxes withheld at the source provided in section 32."

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment no. 13.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion. I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment no. 13.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, this is the so-called "Couzens amendment." It imposes a tax of 10 percent upon the total amount of the normal and the surtax of a particular individual for the year 1934. In other words, after you have calculated your tax, both normal and surtax, under the rates as shall be established in the tax structure, you will then add 10 percent of that total amount to your tax for the year 1934. It applies only to individuals and not to corporations; and it applies to estates in trust.

The conferees of the House are in agreement in resisting this Senate amendment. We feel it was absolutely without warrant or justification. We have not been requested by the administration to levy the tax or to raise more revenues from a general tax revision bill.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. In just a moment. It imposes one of the greatest burdens upon the taxpayers that has ever been imposed either in war time or in peace time; and certainly now, when there is no such thing, generally speaking, as profiteering in business, when tax sources have almost dried up, I feel very strongly that we should not impose this additional burden upon the taxpayer.

I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman stated that the administration had not made any indication that it wanted this additional 10 percent to carry on the expenses of recovery. The administration has not made any opposition to it, as far as I know, nor have I seen in the papers that the administration is opposed to a 10-percent emergency tax to help pay the cost of recovery.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will vote to support the motion to disagree to this Senate amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does this amendment apply to the small income tax as well as to the large income tax?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It applies to every individual taxpayer. It does not apply to corporations, but it applies to the individual taxpayer, small and large.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE].

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I have not risen for the purpose of discussing the matter under immediate consideration but with the hope that I may call the attention of the House to the coconut-oil provision of the conference report which has just been adopted, in the hope that before this Congress adjourns some measure may be adopted that will at least relieve the Congress, the American people, and the President of the United States from the attitude of failing to keep faith with the Filipino people.

Some weeks ago the President of the United States and others in authority, both in this country and in the Philippine Islands, including all factions in the islands, entered into a solemn agreement which was finally enacted into law by the Congress, under which processes were laid down for the accomplishment of the independence of the Philippine Islands. This is a "consummation devoutly to be wished" both here and in the islands. Under the terms of that Act, importations from the islands are to remain as they are until the Commonwealth government is established, which will be done within 12 months. Automatically, upon the establishment of the Commonwealth government, the free importation of Philippine goods is curtailed 40 percent, and at the end of 5 years an export tax is applied on all Philippine products.

When the tax bill was under consideration in the Senate the President of the United States, moved by his solemn agreement with the Filipino people, suggested in a letter to Senator HARRISON, the Chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, that the tax on coconut oil would be a violation of the spirit of the Independence Act which had just been passed. May I read to you from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 10 at page 6317 the statement of Senator HARRISON at the time the letter to him from President Roosevelt was read to the Senate, and I should like also to quote the President's letter in this regard:

Senator HARRISON said:

When this matter was before the Committee on Finance I voted against the amendment that is written in the bill because, even though my people are very much interested in cottonseed oil, and I had been appealed to to vote for it, I thought it was a violation of the Independence Act that we had passed for the Philippines; and I was fearful that it might invite a Presidential veto of a very important bill if we did not at least provide an exemption of the average importations from the Philippines of copra and coconut oil. So I talked to the President about this matter, and I received from him this letter, which I desire to read:

"I am advised that H.R. 7835, the revenue bill, now under consideration before your committee, contains a provision imposing an excise tax on coconut oil.

"Now that the Philippine independence bill has been approved, and insofar as the United States is concerned, represents definite commitments to the government and the people of the Philippine Islands, the provisions of section 6 will govern future trade relations with the Islands. Paragraph (b) of this section contemplates that there shall be no restriction placed upon Philippine coconut oil and copra coming into the United States until after the inauguration of the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands. It is my review that the imposition of an excise tax on coconut oil would be a violation of the spirit of this section of the independence act, and that such provision should be eliminated from the revenue bill.

"May I respectfully suggest that your committee be advised of the language which I used in regard to the economic phase of the independence bill in my recent message to Congress."

From the letter of the President you can readily see the embarrassment that must come to the President, as well as to the legislative branch of the Government, by the passage of this act, which, even before the ink is hardly dry upon the Independence Act, and which, I take it, is at least in the nature of a contract entered into between this Government and our dependent peoples in the Far East, violates the letter and the spirit of our solemn agreement on the question of independence for the Filipino people.

Today, the first day of May in America, but yesterday, the first day of May over there, and on the thirty-sixth anniversary of Admiral Dewey's victory at Manila Bay, a new nation was born in the Orient. It so happened that some of us, marvelous as it may seem, heard over the radio at 10 o'clock last night the proceedings of the joint session of the Philippine Legislature as it unanimously accepted the Independence Act recently passed by Congress. This means, I am sure, since all major political factions of the islands are seemingly united in support of the act, that the first great step leading to ultimate and complete independence will be approved by the Filipino people and a constitution similar to ours will be set up for them within a year from this day. These 14,000,000 people, who have progressed as no other people of the Orient have done, due to American influence and the fine cooperation of the people of the islands, have set in motion the machinery that will soon permit them to take their place in the world as an independent nation. Congratulations are in order, both to our Nation and the Filipino people. They are a fine, progressive race who have demonstrated their ability to manage their own affairs and take their place in the great family of nations with all the responsibilities of a self-governing people.

How unfortunate it is that we, the guardians of these people, are seemingly misled by propaganda and such legislative farmers as Mr. Loomis, Mr. Gray, and other farm representatives into the belief that Philippine oil or coconut oil from the Philippine Islands vitally and seriously competes with farm products in this country. The limitations of this hour will not permit me to go into a detailed discussion of that competition. I call your attention to the facts set forth in the statement I shall insert in the RECORD. Many of our own people believe that it competes in an appreciable degree with cottonseed oil, but I have never found a man who knew to just what extent that competition extends. The producer in the livestock business or the raiser of a steer weighing 1,000 pounds would have, as a benefit of this bill, the value of that steer advanced only 5 cents. The joker in this bill is that there is no tax to be applied on tallow. The benefits, small as they are, if there be any for any American industry, to come from this tax which is an embargo tariff in the guise of an excise tax, will go to the packers and rendering plants of this country. Certainly I have no objection to the prosperity of any industry in America. Indeed, I long to see all industry make fair and reasonable returns, but I do object to taxing one bloc of people under the American flag for the exclusive benefit of another bloc under the same flag. Tallow has already increased in price as a result of this legislation. The rendering plants that make tallow from refuse of kitchens, restaurants, and so forth, are having much prosperity. Here today we are making a law that will add to the cost of the users of soap, curtailing the means of livelihood of 3,000,000 of people, small operators, and bring little to our Treasury.

The small amount of benefit accruing to the farmer from this bill is not commensurate with the great principle involved. Mr. Speaker, in the name of 14,000,000 dependent people—as many as there are in the Republic of Mexico—who are under our flag not of their own volition, who have free trade with us not of their own volition, who are wards, if you please, I protest against the tax on coconut oil. These people buy more dairy products from this country than any other nation in the world buys, yet we are today curtailing that buying power. These people buy much of our cotton, and they are our eighth best customer. Nearly 3,000,000 of these people will be unable, as a result of this legislation, to continue to buy the very things our farmers sell them. By the imposition of this tax you are destroying the second largest industry of these people; you are doing it in the face of a promise, or contract, which they in good faith have already carried through.

They have been benefited, it is true, by the influence of American ideals in the Orient. It should be said to our credit and theirs that no colonization in the world can compare with the colonization by the American people in the Philippine Islands. They have reached that status, socially and economically, where they can now take their place in the sun as a great nation. It is unfortunate, I say, that representatives of the American people, at both ends of the Capitol, have seen fit to impose this tax against them immediately upon the passage of the bill initiating their complete independence. [Applause.]

Not only the President of the United States, but the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, the Governor General of the Philippine Islands have repeatedly urged against this tax. I wish to include under leave granted, as a part of these remarks the statement of the Secretary of War, made before the Senate Finance Committee, also other letters and statements.

STATEMENT OF HON. GEORGE H. DERN, SECRETARY OF WAR, BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON FINANCE, UNITED STATES SENATE, RELATIVE TO THE REVENUE BILL (H.R. 7835), MARCH 16, 1934

Mr. Chairman, on February 15, 1934, I sent you a letter for the consideration of your committee which I presume has been made a part of the record of these hearings. In this letter I expressed briefly my views relative to the provision contained in section 602 of H.R. 7835 which imposes an excise tax of 5 cents per pound on coconut oil.

With the approval of the President, I now desire to supplement my statement contained in that letter, and to reiterate my recommendations that this provision be eliminated from the bill.

Our trade relations with the Philippine Islands are governed by provisions contained in successive tariff laws relating to this trade. Prior to 1909 there was a tariff of 75 percent on Philippine products entering the United States. The provision of the Treaty of Peace with Spain that permitted Spanish ships and goods free entry into the Islands for a period of 10 years was an obstacle to free trade. At the expiration of this 10-year period, however, free trade, with certain limitations or quotas on sugar, tobacco, and rice, was established under the Tariff Act of 1909.

The Tariff Act of 1913 removed all of the limitations imposed by the Tariff Act of 1909 and provided practically for free trade between the Islands and the United States. The provisions of the 1913 act are contained in subsequent tariff acts and have remained continuously in force as an apparently settled national policy in dealing with the Philippine Islands. Under that policy trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States has been greatly stimulated to the mutual advantage of both peoples.

The history of our occupation of the Philippine Islands during the past 35 years constitutes a brilliant chapter in the accomplishments of the United States. The administration of the islands under the United States has been of immeasurable benefit to the Filipino people. It presents to the world an entirely new philosophy in dealing with overseas dependencies. The great progress made in their general economic development has been largely due to the policy of free and unrestricted trade between the islands and the United States. This trade has been the principal means of developing the present standard of life in the islands above that of the surrounding areas. For example, according to the statement of a former Governor General of the Philippine Islands, "the standard of living of the Filipino laborer is at least 300 percent higher than that of his neighbor in China. It is much higher than that of any similar labor in the other surrounding countries like Java or Singapore."

The coconut industry is one of the vital factors of Philippine life. Coconut oil and copra from which the oil is made in the United States are products of the second industry of the Philippine Islands. Coconut oil produced in the Philippine Islands and coconut oil produced in the United States from Philippine copra constitute about 68 percent of the coconut oil consumed in the United States, the remainder being made from copra brought in from foreign countries duty free. The proposed excise tax, if collected in full on the amount of coconut oil received from the Philippine Islands in 1933, would amount to about $29,732,000, which is as much as the entire revenues received by the insular government for 10 months of the same year ($29,685,767). This would certainly be a heavy burden to place upon a single industry in any part of our country. The imposition of such a tax would not be in keeping with the policy which Congress up to now has uniformly followed in the enactment of legislation affecting the vital interests of the islands. The proposed tax will impose a burden on several million Filipinos far out of line with the benefits that may be expected to accrue to the people of the United States. It is contrary to the principle of reciprocal trade. I do not believe the situation in the United States demands undue sacrifices on the part of any of our overseas dependencies except insofar as the principle of fair and equal treatment to all areas under the American flag may demand sacrifices.

Due to the existence of free trade between the United States and the Philippine Islands, the bulk of the external trade of the islands is with the United States (total of about 72 percent). Over 81 percent (5-year average) of the Philippine exports are sent to the United States and about 63 percent of the external purchases of the Philippine Islands are made in the United States, thus showing a good reciprocal trade relationship.

The Philippine Islands stand first as purchasers of United States dairy products with which coconut oil is alleged to compete. Our dairy industry should not overlook this fact when it advocates an excise tax which presumably will adversely affect our export market for dairy products. The Philippines also stand first in the purchase of United States cotton textiles. Other items of importance are tobacco products, paper, rubber, iron and steel, electrical and sugar-mill machinery, automobiles, chemicals, drugs, books, etc. A complete list of the articles imported into the Philippine Islands from the United States would embrace almost the entire list of articles raised and produced in this country. All of these goods are admitted to the Philippine Islands free of duty while imports from other countries are forced to pay an average of approximately 20 percent ad valorem. I repeat that any restriction in the use of coconut oil in the United States would have a correspondingly adverse effect on Philippine purchases from the United States. Coconut oil ranks second in value of Philippine products sent to the United States.

On March 2 the President sent a message to Congress relative to Public, No. 311, Seventy-second Congress (Philippine Independence Act), which has again been introduced in the Congress with certain proposed amendments (S. 2935 and H.R. 8424). With reference to the economic provisions of that act the President said:

"To change, at this time, the economic provisions of the previous law would reflect discredit on ourselves."

Section 6 (a) thereof authorizes an annual quota of 200,000 tons of coconut oil to be shipped to the United States, and, of course, contemplates that this oil shall have free access to our markets except as provided in the act. Imposing an excise tax on this product of the Philippine Islands and on duty-free copra from foreign countries is equivalent to levying a tariff thereon. Such action would, in effect, change the agreement implied in section 6 (a) of Public, No. 311, Seventy-second Congress, to the detriment of the Filipino people. When accepted the terms of this act presumably become a sort of contract between the two countries, which should not be changed without mutual agreement. This fact would seem of itself to be a firm objection to placing an excise tax on coconut oil at this time.

A careful study of this subject leads to the following conclusions:

1. The following interests would thereby be adversely affected:

(a) Several million Filipinos who are dependent on this industry for a livelihood. Eight Provinces of the Philippine Islands depend almost exclusively on coconuts. Thirty out of the forty-nine Provinces of the islands would be crippled in their first or second industry. Obviously, the property-tax revenues of the Philippine government and of its subdivisions would be seriously affected, causing embarrassing fiscal problems. Schools would probably have to be closed and other public services discontinued or curtailed.

(b) The American shipping interests would suffer. The round trip of oil tankers carrying mineral and other oils to the Orient return loaded with coconut oil, which makes these trips profitable. Other cargoes help to fill ships, resulting from purchases made in the United States from the proceeds of coconut oil and copra.

2. Whatever benefits might accrue to the United States from this tax would be at a burdensome cost to the Filipino people. Have we the moral right to try to build up one group of our producers by tearing down another group which also lives under the American flag?

3. In view of the declared purposes of this Government as regards Philippine independence, the Filipino people have the right to expect of us fair and considerate legislation that will enable them to work out the formula for the establishment of a free and independent government under which their economic, political, and social institutions as developed under American guidance shall have a reasonable chance to survive. We have the responsibility of helping them to work out this formula of independence. In the meantime the Filipinos are under American sovereignty and are entitled to fair trade relations. The enactment of this provision relative to coconut oil would be out of line with the policy which Congress has uniformly followed, namely, that of according fair and equal treatment to all areas under our flag.

I have here a number of radiograms received from the Governor General of the Philippine Islands which, if they have not already been included, I recommend be made a part of the record of these hearings.

In conclusion I desire to quote the following extracts from a radiogram (no. 57, Feb. 9, 1934) received from the Governor General of the Philippine Islands:

"The proposed tax is equal to 200 percent of the current price of the product and is more likely to destroy the Philippine coconut industry than to produce any substantial revenue. * * *

"Financially this means the bankruptcy of 8 important provinces mainly dependent on the coconut industry and the questionable success of 10 others. The resulting decline in revenues will imperil essential government services and interest payments on provincial bonds in the area affected. * * * Socially it will entail wide-spread distress and dissatisfaction among the people. It is suggested that any benefit that may accrue to domestic interests from such a measure cannot outweigh or equalize the wholesale harm and distress that it will cause here." * * *

In another message (No. 83, Feb. 24, 1934) the Governor General states:

"Intimate contact with the situation locally forces on me the conclusion that the unlimited application of the tax will provoke a near disaster in the economy of the Philippines."

Mr. McDUFFIE. We have tried for 30 years without success to use cottonseed oil in the making of soap. The only competition with cottonseed oil by coconut oil is its use in the manufacture of oleomargarine and some of the table oils. More than 70 percent of the coconut oil imported into America goes into the manufacture of the finer soaps and we have been unable to find a successful substitute for coconut oil for this industry. Less than 19 percent of the coconut oil imported competes in edible products. As proof that coconut oil does not appreciably compete with cottonseed oil, figures of the Department of Commerce show that when cottonseed oil was selling at a cheaper price than coconut oil, the consumption of coconut oil greatly increased. Only 3 percent of the total oils and fats used in America is coconut oil; and yet if we believe the legislative farmers referred to, and on whose pay roll I know not, nor have I personally inquired, we are led to believe that the farmers of the country, especially the dairy farmers, are to be greatly benefited as a result of this tax.

The fact that the conferees have placed a 5-cent tax on coconut oil imported from all other countries, and a 3-cent tax on that imported from the Philippine Islands, was, of course, all the conferees could do. The House passed the 5-cent tax under a rule, as you recall, which permitted no amendments and we were not privileged to try to eliminate this item from the bill. The Senate made the tax 3 cents and provided also that all moneys collected from this tax would be returned to the Philippine government. Unfortunately there will be little money collected from a tax on coconut oil coming into America from the Philippine Islands. This oil sells for 3 cents a pound and less today, and, of course, it will find a market in other countries, probably Canada, and most likely Japan.

This tax is a blow to the manufacturers of soap in America. It is a blow to American labor engaged in those plants. In my judgment, I repeat, it is unjustified and unworthy of the American people, whose policy with the Philippine Islands has very properly been a generous and fair one. This provision of the bill, in my judgment, would fully justify the President in exercising his veto power in order that a great nation might live up to its pledged word. As Commissioner GUEVARA well said today, "With one hand we hand them independence, and with the other hand we strike a severe blow at their economic welfare." No nation in the world can regard this as fair treatment. This Congress should retrace its steps by a resolution in sofe form, either permitting the Agricultural Administration to levy a tax, if necessary, which it doubtless now has the power to do, or to give the President discretionary power in dealing with the tax, or provide the fair and just thing, which would be language that complies with section 6 of the independence act relative to importations from the Philippine Islands.

I should like to include here a letter written by Commissioner GUEVARA to the President which has my entire approval, and which I think fairly sets forth the effect of this bill, as well as the attitude of the Filipino people.

The letter follows:

APRIL 16, 1934.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.
(Through the Secretary of War.)

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Following my conference today with the Secretary of War on the excise tax on Philippine coconut oil, I am leaving this letter with him with the request that he be good enough to submit it to your distinguished consideration.

I desire to associate myself with Your Excellency, the Secretary of War and various Members of Congress in declaring that the excise tax in question is a violation of the terms, the spirit, and the plan of the Tydings-McDuffie Act, which the American Government has just offered the Filipino people as their new organic law, and as the covenant that shall govern the political and economic relations between the United States and the Philippines before complete Philippine independence is achieved.

If such violation is permitted to stand, I am afraid it would set a precedent for similar violations respecting other Philippine products, and that would simply mean inaugurating in the Philippines while still under the American Flag, the reign of poverty and penury, chaos and confusion, uncertainty and more uncertainty.

Philippine industries would be destroyed before they could even start an orderly readjustment, which in itself is a mighty difficult operation, from the present tariff-protected to the unprotected basis during the 10-year transition period contemplated in the Tydings-McDuffie Act.

Mr. President, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show, the coconut oil excise tax has been posed as a question of the American farmer versus the Filipino farmer, and Members of Congress were frank in saying that they were for the former. As the Philippines have no vote in Congress and not even a voice in the Senate, it was to be expected that a more judicial attitude would be taken on questions affecting the Philippines.

There are proofs overwhelming that between American agriculture and the Philippines there are infinitely more points of harmony and mutual benefit than competition and conflict. What is needed is a calm examination of their mutual interests.

In the debate in the Senate it was repeatedly stated that taxing the Philippine coconut oil is merely placing the Filipino copra producer on a comparable basis with the American farmer with respect to the processing tax under the A.A.A. May I point out the difference between the two cases by saying that the processing tax accrues directly to the American farmer while the coconut oil excise tax goes to the Philippine government, which, under the Norris amendment, is prohibited from subsidizing the coconut industry under penalty of forfeiting the tax.

The provision to give the tax that may be collected to the Philippine government does nothing but raise false hopes for more revenue. The rate of 5 cents a pound is equivalent to 130 percent ad valorem. The steep price increase would inevitably force the consumption of coconut oil in American industries to the very minimum. We have the word of the proponents of the tax that coconut oil is not indispensable except in certain industries which use perhaps less than 5 percent of the coconut oil now consumed.

The net effect of the tax would be to reduce the coconut oil and copra exports of the Philippines to the United States to a very small proportion of the present amounts and the corresponding increase of copra surplus in the Philippines for disposal at depressed prices in the markets of the world.

The Filipino copra producer would get less from his product than he is getting now, which is already near the starvation basis, and the Philippine government would not get the revenue, but instead would probably be the loser as its present substantial income from the sales' tax on copra and coconut oil suffers considerable diminution.

I am, therefore, urging you to take the necessary action not only to save a major industry in the Philippines but also to save the Tydings-McDuffie Act from virtual disintegration.

Faithfully yours,

PEDRO GUEVARA,
Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands.

Enclosure: New York Times Editorial, April 13, 1934.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I also set out below a letter from former Commissioner Quezon, now president of the Philippine Senate, to the Secretary of War.

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 3, 1934.

Hon. GEORGE H. DERN,
Secretary of War, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It has come to my attention that there is talk of a compromise whereby the excise taxes in section 602 of the 1934 revenue bill would be placed in line, according to the proponents of the idea, with the Tydings-McDuffie bill, by allowing the importation into the United States excise tax free of 200,000 long tons of coconut oil from the Philippines, 100,000 of which will enter in the form of copra and the other 100,000 tons in the form of oil.

Let me point out that this would be a most serious violation of the terms of the Tydings-McDuffie bill. The Tydings-McDuffie bill provides for the duty-free entry into the United States of 200,000 long tons of coconut oil in the form of oil and there is no question of a limitation on the amount of copra which can be shipped from the Philippines to the United States. I desire, first, to point out that if there is any such compromise made the Filipino should be allowed to ship in such oil as he supplies the United States with in the form of coconut oil. In other words, the Philippine mills must be allowed to produce this oil, thereby providing employment for Philippine labor and giving the Filipino the profit and the Philippine government the revenue from taxation, which will accrue from crushing the oil in the islands.

If the bill is so altered that we must ship both copra and oil into the United States, then the amount of business which can be done by our oil mills in the Philippines will be so small that they will not be able to carry on. The total amount of oil which we could ship to the United States under the Tydings-McDuffie bill would be 448,000,000 pounds. If this be cut in half, we could then ship only 224,000,000 pounds of oil, whereas our Philippine mills actually shipped to the United States last year in the form of oil 316,000,000 pounds.

We cannot agree to any limitation of the amount of copra which we can ship from the Philippines. The bill provides no such limitation, and it would be suicide for the Philippine copra producers if the amount which they could ship were limited to a quantity necessary to supply 100,000 long tons of oil to the United States in the form of copra.

I cannot too strongly impress upon you that, so long as the Filipino is producing more than 200,000 long tons of coconut oil per annum, or more than enough copra to supply this amount of oil, there is no means whereby the price of coconut oil to the Filipino can be increased to the point whereby he can collect any increase in price of Philippine coconut oil, even if 200,000 tons of Philippine coconut oil were exempted from the excise tax. This would be because the Filipino would be in no position to exact a higher price for his oil from the American buyer than he would from the buyer in other international markets. Before he would be in a position to exact this higher price he would have to cut down sufficient of his trees so that he would be producing only 200,000 long tons of coconut oil per annum; and we cannot do this, as the farmers in our copra-producing provinces have no other means of earning their livelihood.

Last year the Philippines shipped to the United States alone in the form of coconut oil and oil in the form of copra, 600,000,000 pounds of oil. In addition to this we sold 30 percent of our copra in international markets. It is our surplus above the 200,000 long tons, which would set the price of our oil, and on the basis of United States importations alone you can see that for 1933 we had a surplus of 112,000,000 pounds of oil, and to this we would be obliged to add the oil in the copra exported to Europe and other copra-crushing regions.

Very respectfully,

MANUEL L. QUEZON.

Also a cablegram from American Chamber of Commerce at Manila:

SIGNAL CORPS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Manila, April 4, 1934.

NLT SECRETARY WAR,
Washington, D.C.:

We cannot emphasize too strongly our conviction that excise tax coconut oil and copra will result in serious economic difficulties here and will be reflected not only through Filipino distress and actual suffering but in all American trade and activities. We feel this tax is unfair to islands, and its projected advantages are far outweighed by serious consequences involved. We rely on sense of justice of the Senate to prevent this discriminatory legislation against American soil.

AMERICAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The Governor General, Frank Murphy, on April 10, cabled the Secretary of War as follows:

APRIL 10.

SECRETARY WAR,
Washington, D.C.:

Reference your 161. Press dispatches indicate serious attention being given to an amendment exempting from the proposed excise tax 520,000,000 pounds or 232,100 long tons of Philippine coconut oil and/or equivalent Philippine copra. This low exemption would create a distinctly difficult situation in the Philippines due to the fact that we exported to the United States in 1933 155,019 long tons of oil and 204,713 long tons of copra, which at the accepted rate of extraction of 65 percent is equivalent to 133,063 long tons of oil, giving a total in terms of oil of 288,082 long tons. From the foregoing it will be seen that there will be a forced reduction of about 20 percent. I suggest the following be considered by the Secretary of War and by others to whom he wishes to refer the matter: The Philippine government's position is taken in consonance with the Tydings-McDuffie Act, which the Philippine government interprets as containing an implied guaranty that the Philippines will not suffer for the period of the act any greater economic restriction than those therein imposed. In respect to the coconut industry the Tydings-McDuffie Act is interpreted as guaranteeing the duty-free admission into the United States of 200,000 long tons of Philippine coconut oil and no limitation whatsoever on Philippine copra. The modification of the economic terms of this act by means of excise or other taxes either directly or indirectly will be interpreted as an infringement of the implied guaranties and will cause a concussion of economic and political motives which is highly undesirable. I believe that this viewpoint of the situation cannot be too strongly emphasized.

MURPHY.

I also quote the following letter to Senator HARRISON from the Secretary of War:

MARCH 23, 1934.

Hon. PAT HARRISON, Chairman
Committee on Finance, United States Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HARRISON: In connection with the proposed excise tax on coconut oil (sec. 602 of the revenue bill H.R. 7835), reference is made to the views of the Committee on Ways and Means as set forth in that committee's report to accompany H.R. 8687 entitled "A bill to amend the tariff act of 1930" (H.Rept. 1000, 73d Cong., 2d sess., Mar. 17, 1934). The following statement appearing on page 15, under Modern Procedure, would appear to be pertinent to the provisions of section 602 of H.R. 7835:

"Particular notice should be taken, moreover, of the fact that the President may seek from other countries promises that their excise duties shall not be such as to nullify the results of their promises to modify their tariff duties. * * *

"In order that the necessary reciprocity may be accorded, the President is empowered to promise that existing excise duties which affect imported goods will not be increased during the term of any particular agreement. It should be carefully noted, however, that the President is given no right to reduce or increase any excise duty."

Under the provisions of section 17 of the Philippine independence bill which has now passed both Houses the act will become effective when accepted by concurrent resolution of the Philippine Legislature or by a convention called for that purpose. Section 6 thereof will govern future trade relations between the Philippine Islands and the United States. The proposed excise tax on coconut oil will, therefore, immediately become an infringement of the implied agreement between the two countries.

I am bringing this to your attention in the hope that it may be possible for your committee to give further consideration to this subject with a view to eliminating from the revenue bill the provisions for an excise tax on coconut oil.

Very sincerely,

GEO. H. DERN, Secretary of War.

The New York Times said editorially of this provision of the tax bill:

The effect upon the Filipinos, if this breach of good faith is allowed to stand, will certainly be harmful. * * * Our Congress is indifferent to what may truthfully be called the "plighted word" of the United States Government.

The San Francisco Chronicle said of the plan to return to the Philippine government proceeds from the tax:

It does not in any way touch the evils that would flow from the levy. It would not save the Pacific coast coconut-oil-refining industry or the steamship lines between the islands and the United States or help the soap and cosmetic manufacturers that use coconut oil. Nor would it cure the injustice to the Philippines, which is its pretense, for it would do no good to the island coconut-oil producers put out of business. In the face of the opposition of the whole administration, from the President down, and of Secretary of Agriculture Wallace's considered statement that this prohibitive tax on coconut oil is not the answer to the dairyman's problem, the determination in Congress to jam this measure through becomes a very strange thing.

The South Bend Tribune had this to say:

From the Federal revenue viewpoint, there would be no material benefit in that taxation. The benefit promised to American agriculture is grossly exaggerated.

The New York Herald Tribune, in referring to the injustice of the act, said:

The iniquity of this act lies not only in its injustice, but in its cynicism. The ink is scarcely dry on the signature of the new independence bill, which specifically safeguards the Filipinos against the arbitrary closing of the American markets for Philippine products when the Senate passes this measure, which violates the basic principle underlying the independence bill. Its effect on the Filipino people may well be imagined. With one hand Congress offers independence in a form not desired by the Filipinos and with the other it destines them to ruin. The coconut industry has been built up on the American market, to which coconut oil has always had free entry.

I have quoted these statements, and let me say that there is no soap-manufacturing industry in my district, and most of my constituents are farmers, in an effort to call attention of the Congress and the country to the attitude in which we have placed ourselves, not only in the opinion of those of us in Congress who have given some thought and study to this problem, but it appears that many fair-minded citizens outside of the Congress believe that we are doing an un-American thing in an un-American way.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out a few minutes ago when we had the conference report before us, that it was the largest tax measure in the peace-time history of our country and that we were, very largely, soaking the rich, and that as a result, there being so few rich people left, we will not receive the returns anticipated.

I think it is only fair, however, in discussing tax measures to let the people back home know the truth, and that is that while we are trying to raise money by soaking the rich we are at the same time soaking the poor, and even the unemployed. We are actually helping to destroy productive industry and retarding recovery. I present as my main witness the speech of Franklin D. Roosevelt made at Pittsburgh on October 19, 1932:

Taxes are paid in the sweat of every man who labors, because they are a burden on production and can be paid only by production. If excessive, they are reflected in idle factories, tax-sold farms, and hence in hordes of the hungry tramping the streets and seeking jobs in vain. Our workers may never see a tax bill, but they pay in deductions from wages, in increased cost of what they buy, or (as now) in broad cessation of employment. There is not an unemployed man, there is not a struggling farmer whose interest in this subject is not direct and vital. * * *

* * * If, like a spendthrift, it (the Government) throws discretion to the winds, is willing to make no sacrifice at all in spending, extends its taxing to the limit of the people's power to pay, and continues to pile up deficits, it is on the road to bankruptcy. * * *

This statement was made by Franklin D. Roosevelt as a candidate for the Presidency; and he goes on to say:

I shall approach the problem of carrying out the plain precept of our party, which is to reduce the cost of the current Federal Government operations by 25 percent. Of course, that means a complete realignment of the unprecedented bureaucracy that has assembled in Washington in the past 4 years.

* * * Now, I am going to disclose to you a definite personal conclusion which I adopted the day after I was nominated in Chicago. Here it is: Before any man enters my Cabinet he must give me a twofold pledge of—

(1) Absolute loyalty to the Democratic platform and especially to its economy plank.

(2) Complete cooperation with me, looking to economy and reorganization in his Department.

I regard reduction in Federal spending as one of the most important issues of this campaign. In my opinion, it is the most direct and effective contribution that Government can make to business.

That, of course, was a campaign speech. After he was elected to office, however, the President of the United States, instead of reducing Federal expenditures increased the national debt by $10,000,000,000, and has established 37 new Commissions, and employed some 40,000 more officeholders. This administration has entered upon an orgy of waste and extravagance, and the spending of billions of dollars on socialistic experiments without any knowledge or apparent care where the money was coming from to pay the bills. The American taxpayers have already been bled white and most sources of revenue have been exhausted. The only tax left is a 2-percent sales tax, and that is inevitable, although it will not come anywhere near balancing the Budget. The only way to balance the Budget is to stop the huge congressional appropriations to plow under and destroy crops and the birth control of pigs and other unsound experiments. This is what Governor Ely, of Massachusetts, has to say with regard to solving the problem we are now discussing—the way to reduce taxes, to encourage business, to employ those who are unemployed. The Governor of Massachusetts, an outstanding Democrat, said, only a few days ago:

If a rather complete abandonment of the very expensive measures for recovery were announced to the American people tomorrow, we would shortly see a return to normal conditions.

I submit that the Governor of Massachusetts is a fairly reputable and competent witness to present to this House. My argument is simply that we are not going to accomplish anything by soaking the rich. We are just driving them into tax-exempt securities by such a program. Yesterday the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] reported unfavorably a resolution from his committee in which I had asked that the names of all those who have over $100,000 in tax-exempt securities should be made known. That resolution was reported adversely by the Ways and Means Committee; but, I submit, that if you want some kind of constructive action, pass a resolution providing for a constitutional amendment before we adjourn doing away with tax-exempt securities. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY].

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offered my preferential motion to recede and concur in the Senate amendment because I believe the American people cannot be fooled by political byplay on the tax question.

This Congress has obligated the American people to pay millions and millions of dollars for the recovery program. Any man or woman in this country who objects to paying 10 percent additional on his or her income tax for a year or two when they are fortunate enough in these times to have an income on which to pay a tax is not patriotically in support of the recovery program.

The political thing to do, of course, is to tell the voters back home in the coming campaign, "I spent all kinds of money for you; I gave you everything for which you asked, and then I refused to make sufficient provision for paying the bills."

It is the duty of the Congress to levy taxes in sufficient amount to pay not only the ordinary and necessary expenses of government but also the extraordinary and emergency expenses such as the cost of the depression and our legislative attempts to overcome it. Likewise, it is the duty of the Congress to be fair with the American people and not put them in the position of contracting debts and then refusing to raise the money to pay them. I believe that the people of this country want to pay for the things they get from government as they go along and not live beyond their means. Naturally, it is a nice thing to vote huge appropriations for C.W.A., P.W.A., A.A.A., and all other activities designed to give employment and take us out of the depression. It is a difficult thing in the face of a campaign, after 2 years of appropriation making, to turn around and render the bill, but the bill must be rendered and no fair-minded person, in my opinion, objects to paying a small additional tax for the benefits the recovery program has brought about so far.

Of course, the political thing to do is to vote for all appropriations and against all taxes, but that is not the practical, the honest, the courageous, or the fair thing to do if the American people hope to be kept a solvent Nation and the Budget is to be balanced and stay balanced.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio for a question.

Mr. TRUAX. Does the gentleman realize that 95 percent of the people of this country pay no income tax? The gentleman from New York says that this is a plan to soak the rich. If so, 95 percent of the men on this side ought to vote for it and a good many on that side.

Mr. O'MALLEY. This question of soaking the rich is entirely aside from the question of taxing the people who have the income. If we do not tax the people who have money, who are we going to tax? Where are we to get the money? How are we going to pay our way as we go along? Are we going to adopt the honest policy of paying our way as we go, or are we going to continue to make political thunder out of tax bills by authorizing all sorts of expenditures on one hand but on the other hand tell the citizens of this Nation that these expenditures do not have to be met by taxes?

I cannot imagine anyone unwilling to contribute 10 percent additional on any income they are fortunate enough to be able to pay in the next 2 years in order to help the American people get back on their feet. I think every man in this Congress would be willing to do that part to help meet our national burden. If we want to go into a campaign and say that we prevented higher taxes, that would make a very nice campaign talk, but in the face of our huge expenditures we would be insincere and not accepting our constitutional duty to keep our country a solvent nation. I do not think we could go to the American people on that kind of an issue and get reelected, if it is reelection we are seeking by defeating this 10-percent emergency tax. If at any time this emergency tax provides too much revenue, the Congress meets again next January and it can be taken from the bill. If the revenues under the bill justify it, and the Director of the Budget so advises, this tax can be eliminated only 8 months or so from now. But in the meantime, with this emergency tax provision we are playing fair with the people and providing some of the means to pay our way as we go along and pay the interest on these billions of dollars of bonds that have been issued to bring about recovery and employment. I do not believe there is anyone in this country who is not willing to pay 10 percent added income tax when they have a job and an income sufficient to pay taxes on at all. If anyone is unwilling to do that much to continue our remarkable progress toward the day when every man is employed, then we are indeed a nation of selfish individuals.

If a man is fortunate enough, with 10,000,000 unemployed still walking the streets of this country, to have an income sufficiently large to pay $25 taxes to the Government under the ordinary rates of this bill, I cannot conceive of his objection to paying $2.50 additional for a year or two to help continue a program that will mean the eventual employment of these still jobless 10,000,000 of our fellow Americans. Of course, 10-percent additional tax on a man who pays a tax of a million dollars is $100,000 more than he will pay if this amendment is defeated; but $100,000 additional taxes, if distributed in C.W.A. or P.W.A. work, would employ 100 heads of dependent families for 1 year at $1,000. This is twice as much wages as is enjoyed by 50 percent of even the workers now employed in this country, if statistics are worth anything.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman knows that the bill before us contains an increase of approximately 50 percent over the bill which passed the House.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I hope it will amount to a 50-percent increase in revenue when the taxes are finally collected, because if it does not we will certainly have a badly unbalanced Budget.

Mr. BOYLAN. Is that not enough, without adding another 10 percent? There is added 50 percent to the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman does not object to contributing 10 percent additional to his taxes in order to pay for the various things which we have obligated the American people to pay for?

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman is contributing 50 percent in comparison to the bill passed by the House.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I cannot agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BOYLAN. If the gentleman will compare the bills, he will see that that is true.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The bill as passed by the House did not provide enough to pay for the ordinary expenses of running the Government.

Mr. BOYLAN. We had a very competent subcommittee of our Ways and Means Committee working on the matter, and they said it was sufficient.

Mr. O'MALLEY. We have a better bill now than when it left the House. As it originally came before us under the gag rule, it lowered taxes on incomes in which our own salaries are involved. This emergency tax would, of course, nullify in part that reduction.

Mr. BOYLAN. Does the gentleman think it is correct to write a revenue bill on the floor?

Mr. O'MALLEY. That is where it should be written—on the floor—if the intent and purpose of the Constitution giving the whole Congress the right to express itself on taxes is to be preserved without gag rules preventing all the Representatives of all the people expressing themselves directly on the vital proposition of taxation.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, of course, it is always unpopular to vote for a tax bill, but the taxes which are being levied in this bill are not being placed upon the American people today when we pass the bill. They are placed upon the shoulders of the American people when Congress, time without number, continued to pass appropriation bills without regard to how the money was to be obtained. It is very easy to pass appropriation bills because we can always find people who want money from the Treasury of the United States, but it is exceedingly difficult to pass a tax bill because we cannot find anyone who wants to pay taxes.

The Couzens amendment in the Senate puts an unbearable tax burden upon the American people, but forget not the fact it is not a starter of the tax burden that is going to be put upon the backs of the American people in order to pay off the debts which this Congress has already incurred. [Applause.] Talk about this being a high tax bill! The total amount of new revenue is $480,000,000, even with the Couzens amendment; yet this Congress has increased the expenditures of government more than $480,000,000 during this session, and when we came here the Government was running behind.

We hear much talk about the evil of tax-exempt securities. It is not the man or the woman who buys the tax-exempt securities who is responsible for the tax-exempt securities. It is the Congress that will make appropriations and then not provide the revenue with which to meet the appropriations. Congress is responsible for the tax-exempt securities. The tax-exempt securities in this country today are held by people who are not meeting their responsibility in government, and that is a responsibility that is upon the shoulders of every Member of Congress who has sat here and made appropriations without providing the revenue with which to meet them. Every dollar of deficit must of necessity mean a dollar of tax-exempt securities. Today somewhere between 25 and 30 percent of the property of this country is tax exempt, and the percentage is increasing day by day, because Congress insists upon making appropriations without providing the revenue with which to meet them. This bill does not meet all of our appropriations; however, it helps toward paying our way.

I am going to vote for this amendment, not because I like to but because it is on the way to a balanced Budget. With the appropriations already made, remember this, the day is never coming when America is going to collect enough money from the income tax to liquidate. The sales tax is already ordained and there is no way to escape it, because Congress has made appropriations and has not provided revenue with which to meet them.

England has balanced her budget and is on her way to prosperity, and this country will never be on its way to prosperity until America balances its Budget. The unemployed are never going to be put back to work until the Government of the United States is a solvent institution, and before that day comes some Congress is going to have the courage to pass a tax bill much greater than this one.

We should not turn down even the Couzens amendment, because it points the way, at least, to sound finance, and sound finance alone points the way to a return to prosperity in this country of yours and mine; and if this be not true, then all the wisdom of the ages has been repudiated overnight. [Applause.] I thank you.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise with the thought that I have any special information to contribute to this discussion. Indeed, I am claiming your attention for only a moment to speak through the voice of duty on this occasion.

Let us not forget that we, more responsible than any other body under the flag for the success of our institutions, have duties to perform; and one of the duties—it ought not to be an unpleasant duty—is to match the revenue for payment with obligations we, ourselves, have contracted. Within a month a vote was taken in this body by which some $200,000,000 was added to the obligations of the Treasury. We promised to pay that much more to our former soldiers and to the servants of the Republic. If this Couzens amendment prevails, it can add not more than some $50,000,000 to the revenues in discharge of the duty we then imposed upon the Treasury. Are we going to discharge that duty?

Let us not forget a most important thing. This country is hanging now from a single thread, the thread of confidence, which still holds, in the credit of the Government of the United States. If that thread breaks, God only knows what may become of us.

This factor of confidence I know is an invisible one, like the blessed atmosphere that sustains our lives. It is invisible, yes, but it is factual and indispensable and anything we may do to build up that confidence will contribute to the restoration for which we are striving and praying. Meanwhile the duty we fail to discharge which weakens that confidence is but applying a sharp blade to the thread of Government credit which still sustains our hopes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I do not have time. I thank the gentleman instead for his most courageous and timely address.

Now, with respect to the burden—let us speak sincerely about the burden—this alleged burden upon the small taxpayer. Take the case of a married couple in the United States, with no children, having a net income of $3,000. Their tax under existing law is but $20 and in this conference report it is reduced to $8. In Great Britain the same couple would pay, not $8 or $20, but $318. The flag that flies over the Empire of Great Britain does not fly over a chancelry its House of Commons has consigned to the "red." Let that House of Commons be an example for this House of Commons this very day. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from Maryland when he spoke about the enormous debt burden hanging on the people of this country. This burden hangs most heavily on the man or the woman who has not income sufficient to pay Federal income taxes.

I can take you into 80 counties in my State of Ohio, and you cannot find a dozen men or women in those counties who have incomes of $3,000 a year. You probably noted the headlines in this afternoon's paper, the Wall Street brokers make $2,000,000,000 while the investors lose $65,000,000. This is the sword of Damocles that is hanging over our heads today. They did not pay taxes on that $2,000,000,000 which they made. J. P. Morgan did not pay his taxes, Kuhn-Loeb did not pay their taxes, nor did the Lamonts and the rest of the multimillionaire racketeers and pirates of Wall Street. I say to you if you go on much longer, if you leave this enormous debt load on the shoulders of the farmer whom we seek to relieve by the passage of the Frazier bill, if you leave this tremendous debt load on the shoulders of laboring men and of small business men who have their life savings tied up in closed banks, whom we seek to relieve with the McLeod bill, which is opposed in this House you will meet disaster. Whenever you get down to the crux of this problem and give the people the kind of money they formerly had and that they want now—silver—whenever you tax every fortune over $1,000,000, 95 percent and whenever you take a fortune like Richard Mellon's, who died with $200,000,000, and authorize the Government to take $190,000,000 of that fortune and leave $10,000,000 to his offspring who never earned a dollar of it, then you will be getting to the base of the tax problem of this great country of ours.

And when I hear gentlemen on this floor whose incomes I have no doubt run away up beyond $100,000 making complaints and crying about a little, lousy, measly increase of 10 percent on their enormous incomes, it reminds me of the time when I used to feed hogs on my farm—you always found a few who had longer snouts, more drive and push, guzzling all the swill in the trough. [Laughter.]

That is the situation of the aristocratic wealth in this country today. They oppose the Frazier-Lemke bill, they oppose the McLeod bill, they oppose all labor bills, and ask you to deliver hog-tied, gagged, and bound the 120,000,000 people to the tender mercies of the Wall Street crowd for all time to come.

That is not my idea of a tax bill. Who opposes this? Not the farmer, not the wage earners, but it is opposed by some insidious lobby down here trying to pull the teeth and clip the claws of the Fletcher-Rayburn stock bill. I want to compliment SAM RAYBURN for his courage and tenacity in framing the language of his bill so that it will pull the teeth and clip the wings of the Wall Street pirates. [Applause.]

That same group, my friends, are today opposing the petition to discharge the committee on the McLeod bill.

Personally I am a poor man wholly dependent upon my salary to keep my family and myself. I have always had to work for a living. Despite this, I am willing to pay the extra 10 percent that the Senate amendment will cost me, if by so doing I can relieve to that humble extent the tax burden that has crushed some poor devil to the ground. I am willing to pay my 10 percent if by so doing I can extract 10 percent more of the huge fortunes of the idle rich.

Back in 1870 Mr. Carlyle said there were only two classes of people—first, the idle holders of idle capital and, second, the struggling masses who create all of the wealth, and in the final analysis, pay all of the taxes. I belong to the struggling masses. I am not attempting to fool myself as to what class I belong to. I know what hardship is. I know what poverty is, and I know what it is to lie awake at night worrying and racking my brain how to pay interest, and how to meet notes of the money lenders and Shylocks the next day.

Therefore, in this fight, I am speaking for the struggling masses. I am championing the rights of the broken-down farmer, the unemployed wageworker, the bankrupted small business man, the veterans of the Spanish-American War, the veterans of the World War. I am speaking for the 8,000,000 or 10,000,000 men who are yet unemployed, and who must depend on Government doles or charity to support themselves and their families.

It is with extreme regret that I must add that at the present moment these struggling masses still lie stricken before the mailed fists of the money kings of Wall Street, of the big bank racketeers in your State and in my State, and of the most offensive, the most ruthless, the most indefensible of all, the international banking racketeers, who now seek to regain the special privilege and right to rob and plunder the masses which was lost to them by legislation passed by this Congress under the leadership, and upon the insistence of that great friend of the common people, President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Today we are confronted in glaring headlines of the nawspapers by the astounding information that the stock brokers of Wall Street made $833,000,000, while the investing public, known to these buccaneers on the high seas of finance as "lambs" and "suckers", lost more than $65,000,000 from 1928–33, the same period during which the Wall Street brokers made gross profits of more than $2,000,000,000 on the stock exchange.

Gross receipts of some exchange houses during that period would include that effervescent boom years of 1925–29, and the tail-spin that followed totaled $2,153,218,671. Expenses were $1,262,007,668, leaving a net profit to the Wall Street dealers of $891,211,003. Deducting $102,838,240 in bad accounts, the actual net earnings were $788,372,763. If the $44,794,923 net profits of the odd-lot firms are added, the total would be $833,167,686.

All of these figures are given by that fearless and courageous investigator, Ferdinand Pecora.

During this period of debauchery of the public purse these Wall Street crooks spent $1,000,000 on what they called public relations. I would call it public bribes and hush money. This enormous amount of ill-gotten money was accumulated by the brokers through their commissions on the sale of stock. These amounted to nearly one billion five hundred and three million. Then like the Shylocks of old they collected usurious interest amounting to nearly $320,000,000.

In addition to that, New York Stock Exchange members operating as individuals obtained gross profits of $92,723,731. Their net profits were $72,885,461. These are some of the vulgar buzzards who have been lobbying for weeks against the Fletcher-Rayburn bill. They infest the National Capitol like a horde of Egyptian locusts. To be approached by one of these vampires is tantamount to an insult to your intelligence, integrity, and honesty. Personally, if one of them should approach me, instead of playing the Good Samaritan act and turning the other cheek to be smacked, I would make these smackers think they had been "smuck" with a Florida hurricane.

This crowd of modern John Silvers are still looking for more treasure, more loot, more plunder. They oppose this amendment to levy 10 percent more taxes on their stolen fortunes. They organized the National Economy League to rob the soldier, slander his memory, and debauch his widow and orphan. They oppose the soldiers' bonus. They oppose the McLeod bill, which proposes to pay off depositors in closed banks. They oppose my bill which is based on the principles of the McLeod bill, but which limits pay-offs in full to $2,500 and includes all banks, including State banks and other member banks of the Federal Reserve System. This would be helping the common people, so they oppose it.

They confidently boast that there will be no inflation or expansion of the currency in this session of Congress. Hence they can go ahead with their legalized economic murder and slaughter of distressed farmers and unemployed workmen.

They are confiscating and stealing the homes of these worthy people at the rate of 3,000 each time the sun rises and sets. That is why they oppose all inflationary measures, and all measures that will plant money down at the grass roots of agricultural and industrial production. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. The question is on receding and concurring in amendment no. 13 on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. That is right.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. If that motion should be voted down, then the question would recur on my motion to insist on the disagreement.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY] to recede and concur.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. O'MALLEY) there were 45 ayes and 167 noes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question of ordering the yeas and nays was taken, and 32 Members arose.

The SPEAKER. Not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

So the motion of Mr. O'MALLEY was rejected.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist on its disagreement to amendment no. 13, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOYLAN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOYLAN. As I understand, the question recurs on the motion that the House insist on its disagreement to amendment 13.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. O'MALLEY. And an "aye" vote is to insist upon the disagreement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 283, nays 77, not voting 70, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Washington to recede and concur with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

H.R. 7835—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the conference report and the amendments in disagreement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state briefly my views in favor of Federal old-age pension and insurance legislation in this country. I deplore the fact that the United States has to share with China and India the national ignominy and disgrace of providing no system of pensions or insurance for its aged indigent citizens.

State old-age pension laws, fostered by a noble fraternal organization, the Fraternal Order of Eagles, are a right step toward a national system, the same as exists in all the other great civilized nations of the world.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS AND INSURANCE IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

I desire to describe briefly the measures adopted in foreign countries to provide a competence for old age, together with data, where obtainable, of the actual operation of the various systems. The descriptive reports for these countries were prepared by the consular representatives of the United States Department of State in the several countries concerned, in accordance with an outline and a memorandum of instructions prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. This study may therefore be regarded as substantially complete, except as regards the Soviet Union, for which country the Bureau has no first-hand information.

The data show that in 39 countries (exclusive of the Soviet Union) one or more systems of pensions or insurance for old age have been established. These countries are enumerated below.

Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Bulgaria, Canada, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, France, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Greenland, Guernsey (Isle of), Hungary, Iceland, Irish Free State, Italy, Japan, Lithuania (Memel Territory), Luxemburg, Netherlands, Newfoundland, New Zealand, Norway, Paraguay, Poland, Portugal, Rumania, South Africa (Union of), Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Uruguay, Yugoslavia.

TYPES OF PLANS

The systems of old-age care are of three main types as regards contribution and benefit:

First. Voluntary insurance: In essence this is merely a system under which the Government sells annuities under more favorable rates than the private insurance companies.

Second. Compulsory insurance: Under this system contributions to a general insurance fund are made by two or all the three parties concerned—the State, the employers, and the employees. Usually, all three parties contribute, as in Great Britain, Germany, and in France. This fund is managed by public authority, and out of it determined benefits are paid to each employee under the system when he attains a certain age.

Third. Public pensions: Here the cost of the system is borne wholly by the public, and pensions are paid to citizens reaching a certain age, without other means of support, and without regard to whether they are or have been employed workers.

Of these three types of systems, the first, voluntary insurance, needs least comment. It has been introduced in only five countries (Canada, France, Italy, Netherlands, and Switzerland), and it has not succeeded, as a rule, in obtaining any large coverage.

As already indicated, the method of approach to the problem of old-age dependency is very different under compulsory insurance and under the public pension. The following points of difference may be emphasized as of particular importance: Under a public-pension system aid is given only in case of actual dependency, and then only in accordance with the need of the individual as established to the satisfaction of the administrative agency. The theory under the compulsory-insurance system is quite different. Under such a system the aim is to accumulate, for all working citizens, against their retirement from industry, an insurance fund which will support them in their old age. The old-age benefits thus received by a retired worker are therefore not dependent upon the degree of dependency or upon proof of need. On the other hand, this system provides only for persons who are or have been workers; it does not cover dependent persons who, for various reasons, may have reached old age without ever having had employment within the meaning of the law.

The compulsory-insurance principle has at present by far the greatest acceptance. In general, the public pension system is favored by the British dominions and the Scandinavian countries and dependencies (except Sweden). The compulsory-insurance system is now in force in the principal industrial countries of Europe, such as France, Germany, Great Britain, and Italy; of these, France and Great Britain also have a pension system.

COVERAGE OF SYSTEM

Not all the systems adopted are complete in their coverage. Thus, in Switzerland only certain cantons have adopted such systems, and in Brazil such legislation applies only to employees of public utilities. Also it is to be noted that in a few instances systems of different character and coverage are in effect in the same country.

In the great majority of countries, however (including the principal industrial countries of Europe, such as England, Germany, and France), the systems in effect cover either the whole population or the whole working population, subject to certain requirements of income, residence, and so forth.

Public old-age insurance or pensions are intended for and applied to the economically lowest groups of the population, principally wage earners and low-salaried employees but may include independent workers, including small employers, employing up to five or six workers. In order to determine these insurable or pensionable groups, the laws set certain economic limits on the basis of earnings, income, or value of property owned. These economic limits vary from country to country even more widely than the age limits.

However, a number of countries, having introduced a public compulsory-insurance system for the low-income groups of the population, have established a secondary, higher-income limit for voluntary insurance; that is, persons whose earnings or incomes are above the limit for compulsory insurance and below the secondary higher limit may come under the compulsory-insurance act if they so desire. Experience shows that these classes do, to some extent, take advantage of such a provision.

AGE LIMIT

There is no generally accepted age limit at which old-age pensions or benefits shall become payable. Not only does the age limit vary from country to country, but often within the same country different age limits are set for the sexes and for different occupational groups; in some insurance systems the age of retirement is dependent on years of service and amount of contributions made.

In general, it may be said that the age limits in European countries vary from 50 to 70 years, the prevailing limits being from 60 to 65 years. In the non-European countries the age limits, on the whole, appear to be somewhat lower than in Europe.

The age limit for women is in many cases fixed 5 years lower than for men.

For more hazardous occupations, such as transport and mining, often a lower age limit is set than for other less hazardous occupations.

In general, the lowest age limits occur under voluntary-insurance systems and the highest under straight-pension systems, while the compulsory-insurance systems occupy a middle position in this respect.

The recent legislative tendency in regard to the age limit seems to be toward flexibility, a certain amount of discretion being left to the administrative authorities to fix age standards within the upper and lower limits set by the law.

CONTRIBUTIONS AND BENEFITS

In case of compulsory insurance the contributions are made either as a certain percentage of wages or salaries or as a definite sum of money to be contributed either weekly or monthly. Public contributions to insurance funds are either proportioned to the contribution shares of the insured and their employers, or are in the form of grants representing definite sums of money either per insured or per beneficiary, or lump sums transferred periodically to the insurance fund.

Some foreign countries have resorted to special taxation and other special means of raising money for the benefit of the insurance or pension funds. The European countries, however, seem to avoid special taxation for public-insurance funds.

Old-age benefits or pensions are usually established at a point which will provide merely the bare necessaries of life or a minimum of comfortable subsistence. As this minimum varies from country to country, from time to time, and even as between economic groups in the same country, the amount of benefit or pensions paid in different countries and for different groups of persons in the same country varies greatly.

With a few exceptions, the benefits and pensions are considerably lower than the wages or salaries earned before old-age retirement. As a rule, in the case of insurance systems the amount of benefit is based upon the amount of contributions made in behalf of the insured, while the amount of contribution is based upon a certain percentage of wages or salary, or of income in the case of independent workers.

In order closely to relate earning ability with contributions, varying numbers of graded wage or income classes are often set up. As, however, minute classification complicates administrative work, there is a tendency either to decrease the wage classes to a smaller number or to do away with them entirely, leaving only the upper insurable or pensionable income limits.

In a number of European countries the ordinary or regular benefits or pensions are rather small, especially in view of the increasing cost of living and depreciation of money value, in post-war years. Various increases and additional benefits have therefore been introduced, usually termed "bonuses", "allowances", "supplementary benefits", "special grants", and so forth.

SURVIVORS' BENEFITS

Most of the old-age insurance or pension systems made provision for dependent survivors, such as widow or widower, orphans, parents, and so forth.

Usually the amount of the widow's benefit is one half of the benefit of her deceased husband.

Almost all insurance systems provide that the total benefit for survivors may not exceed the benefit of the deceased.

STATISTICS OF OPERATION

The table following shows, for each country for which data are available, the number of persons covered by the various systems, the number of beneficiaries, and the average benefit:

NOTE.—Foregoing data quoted from Bulletin No. 561 of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I hope that the day is not far distant when we will have a nationalized old-age pension and insurance system in America, so that no American citizen will ever be compelled to eat the bitter bread of charity or enter a charitable institution.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, today I reluctantly voted against the conference report on the tax bill. Almost invariably have I supported the action and judgment of our committees of the House, but in this instance I found it impossible to follow my usual course. Of course, a vote against the adoption of the conference report was not a vote against the tax bill as adopted in the House, or as finally adopted. I voted for the tax bill as it passed the House. A vote against the adoption of the conference report was merely a vote to send the bill back to conference for further consideration of the differences between the two Houses.

I was impelled to vote as I did for the reason that I believe that the House conferees were too liberal in yielding to certain amendments adopted on the floor of the Senate, and especially those pertaining to the elimination of consolidated returns, which elimination I understand the administration opposed, and the publicity of income-tax returns, and the tariff on coconut oil, and so forth.

While the bill itself as finally agreed upon in conference will compel the American people to pay practically twice as much in taxes as the administration or the House committee or the House itself felt was necessary at this time, I could have tolerated the increase as well as the increases in the inheritance taxes which I feel are somewhat unreasonable, if it were not for the amendment pertaining to the publicity of income-tax returns. I have heretofore voted against any such an un-American provision. The fact that the publication of how much our citizens pay in income taxes may give rise to blackmail, suckers' lists, or kidnapers' lists does not influence me as much as the firm conviction I have that such a public announcement violates the personal privacy of our citizens. Surely there must be some small right of privacy which should be retained for our citizens. While the Government is entitled to know how much we earn or receive as income, such information should not be public property of every Wall Street confidence man or every racketeer.

If it were only because of the amendment providing for the publicity of income-tax returns, I would feel amply justified in the action I took in voting against the adoption of the conference report in the hope that the conferees and the managers on the part of the Senate might reconsider this proposal and relieve our citizens from this gross un-American invasion of their private affairs.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made today in the RECORD by including therein a letter from the President, written to Senator HARRISON, together with a radiogram from the Philippine Islands to the Secretary of War and communications from other people who have made a study of this problem.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE COUZENS AMENDMENT

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks upon the tax bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the main object of the income tax bill, according to its framers in the House, was the plugging of loopholes through which the wealthiest men of the country, the leaders of finance, wholly escaped Federal income taxation, and it is complained that the Senate amendments have diverted the bill from this main object and converted it into a new and heavy income-tax measure.

The term "loophole" in connection with the existing income tax law strikes me as a misnomer. The term "loophole" is defined to be a narrow aperture or opening. Its original use was a peephole through which to watch the maneuvers of the enemy and to fire through. This seems to me entirely too restrictive a term to apply to tax laws which enable the greatest fortunes in the country to entirely escape taxation. Even tunnels would not take in enough space to define such avenues of escape. Both loopholes and tunnels imply some structural bounds, something to find loopholes in or dig tunnels through.

Even though this bill had its inception in the disclosures before the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, that the 20 kings of finance composing the House of Morgan, and the kings of finance composing Kuhn-Loeb & Co., and other money magnates, pay no income taxes because the law does not require them to pay any, and was designed to plug up the so-called "loopholes" or block the fugitive tunnels, this situation is not the real test by which to determine the propriety or necessity of the Senate amendments, boosting the House provisions from $258,000,000 to $470,000,000.

The real test is whether the Government needs the money. If it does, it ought to be raised. The answer to the question whether the Government needs the money is an all-time record in the way of a national debt, amounting to $30,000,000,000 and projected to $32,000,000,000 within a year. This debt now draws interest in round numbers to the amount of $1,000,000,000 a year, and projected to twelve hundred and fifty million dollars a year. The question of balancing the Budget, which is stressed by many as the only road to recovery and prosperity, may be left out of such an account. Even with this added tax of $470,000,000, there is no likehood of balancing the Budget. One need not weary his brains with figures and calculations. One can just shut his eyes and know that the additional taxes laid in the Senate amendments will not be too much and will not be enough.

In order to lay the additional taxes over the provisions of the House bill the Senate made nearly 200 amendments. The House conferees accepted the great majority of these amendments and composed the differences on all the others which involved tax increases, except one. As to all these changes, therefore, it makes no difference at this stage of the game what the original idea of the bill was. At this time there is disagreement only on one change made by the Senate in the House bill, and against the acceptance of this change the House has recorded its will by a vote of 283 to 79 and has sent this item back to conference between the two Houses.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a pretty substantial expression of the will of the Houses. As one of the 79 who voted against sending this item back to conference, which was tantamount to a vote for the Senate amendment, I want to address myself briefly to the consideration of that amendment and the reasons impelling my vote.

I have found it a pretty good plan to think over these controversial points in a quiet hour, provided a Member of Congress can find any such time as a quiet hour. I have found it a pretty good plan to keep an ear to the argument as it develops instead of waiting for the appeal of the last man to address the jury. By this process I had decided even before the conference report came before the House that Senate amendment no. 13, known as the "Couzens amendment", which imposes for the year 1934 only an additional tax of 10 percent over and above the amount levied by the regular taxes in the bill, should be approved. Reduced to an illustrative figure, the man who has to pay $10 without this amendment will have to pay $11 with it. The regular amount of his payments will be increased just 10 percent for 1 year. This is estimated to produce an additional revenue of $55,000,000. The elimination of the amendment will cut the total from $470,000,000 to $415,000,000 in round numbers.

The author of the amendment, in presenting his amendment to the Senate, is quoted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 11, at page 6401, as follows:

> The tax provided for in the amendment ranges from 80 cents additional tax on the man with an income of $3,000 a year up to $57,000 on the man who has an income of $1,000,000 a year.

This statement illustrates better than mine the small amount of this additional tax and the spread of it from the lowest to the highest bracket.

Representative DAVID A. LEWIS, of Maryland, a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, stated some significant facts during the debate. One of his statements was as follows:

> Take the case of a married couple in the United States, with no children, having a net income of $3,000. Their tax under existing law is but $20, and in this conference report it is reduced to $8. In Great Britain the same couple would pay not $8, or $20, but $318.

It is small wonder that the British Government has balanced its budget.

However, Mr. Speaker, I am not pleading for high taxes. The considerations which move me are these: The income tax is conceded to be the fairest and most equitable form of taxation. The taxpayer pays only according to his ability. If he does not get the income, he does not pay the tax. This exempts 98 out of every 100 people. Only 2 percent of the people would pay any of this added 10 percent of tax. They would pay it because they had something which 98 percent of the people do not have, to wit, a taxable income. I sincerely hope that I shall have the good fortune to remain in the 2-percent class. At times I have fallen out of it, and the experience was much more painful than paying income taxes. My only financial misgiving is that the time may come when I will not have to pay an income tax.

On top of this, the Government needs the money. It needs it to pay principal and interest on $30,000,000,000 of tax-free, interest-bearing bonds. It needs it to pay $4,000,000,000 of current expenditures. It needs it not simply to attain a balancing of the Budget, but to preserve the credit of the Government of the United States.

Every monopoly of the United States has paid dividends throughout this historic, this unprecedented depression. The wealth of the United States has been reduced by half. The remaining half is mortgaged for more than it is worth. But every monopoly has paid and is still paying dividends. The recipients of these dividends, which are produced by all of the people and received by a few of them, can and should bear the additional burden of this much-needed taxation. Any man with a taxable income can and should do the same thing.

Mr. Speaker, I am not able to apprehend the reasoning of the House in rejecting this tax. I do not question its motives. I know the Members who voted to reject it are just as conscientious as those who voted for it. They fear the effects of the added burden. They are apprehensive that it will be resented. They fear that the man who puts his name on the roll call in favor of this added burden will have to pay for it with many votes at the polls. I do not concur in this view, and would not be governed by it if I did. There is no partisanship in the action of the House. A majority on both sides voted to reject the so-called "Couzens amendment."

Mr. Speaker, one final reason moves me. This amendment reflects the action of the progressive Members of both parties at the other end of the Capitol. Their action has been beneficially reflected in all the history-making legislation of the Seventy-third Congress. I find it impossible to escape the sympathies and reactions which bind me to this group. I consider progressivism the hope of America. Progressivism is blazing the trail for the new deal and the new day, if there is any such goal. I believe there is. If I did not believe this, I would fold up; my interest in national affairs would die for want of a faith on which to live.

RIVERS AND HARBORS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday General Markham, Chief of Engineers of the Army, delivered an informative address before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include that address.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Maj. Gen. E. M. Markham, Chief of Engineers, United States Army:

Mr. President and gentlemen, it is a privilege and an honor to talk to this membership of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. I believe that the history of these congresses dates from the first convention held in Baltimore in 1901, and that since your reorganization in 1906, the influence has been of major proportions upon comprehensive and intelligent improvement of our most valuable and productive natural assets, our rivers and harbors.

As you know, the Corps of Engineers acts as the technical advisor of the Government in determining the possibilities of our waterways development and in planning their improvement. The Congress normally approves the plans, provides the funds, and is the directing authority. Associations such as yours represent important public interests in such improvements and in their manner of execution. Your responsibilities and our responsibilities are both heavy. It is therefore doubly fitting that we have this opportunity to meet, to discuss our problems, and to exchange our views.

Although the members of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress are doubtless acquainted with the procedure under which river, harbor, and flood-control projects are investigated, it seems pertinent to grasp this opportunity to point out again the careful and painstaking investigations and studies behind an adopted project. First, such a project must have the demonstrable conviction of local interests as to its desirability. Through their initiative, legislation by Congress must be secured authorizing the Corps of Engineers to conduct a preliminary examination and survey. The first or preliminary investigation is made by the district engineer assigned to the locality. His report is reviewed by the division engineer, and in turn by the older, more experienced members of the Board of Engineers for rivers and harbors. If the report on this preliminary examination is unfavorable, Congress is advised at once. If the aspects are favorable, the Board recommends a more detailed survey to include a determination of costs and potential transportation or other savings. Upon the approval of the Chief of Engineers, the local district engineer conducts such a detailed survey. His second report is reviewed by the division engineer and by the Board of Engineers and passed to the Chief of Engineers, who submits it with appropriate recommendations to the Secretary of War for transmission to Congress.

These reports are carefully studied by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives with hearings at which proponents and opponents are given full opportunity to present their views. The recommendations of the committee are included in a river and harbor bill presented to Congress for its action. There are no public projects today in the country, nor so far as known, in any country, which are given the extensive analysis and study which apply to these river-and-harbor improvements before their adoption as Federal projects; and while there may be individual cases which have not fully realized their expectations, by and large, for the sums disbursed and the results obtained, it is doubtful if any expenditures by the Federal Government give to the people of the United States as large a return, measurable in dollars and cents, as the improvements of our waterways for navigation and for flood control.

Prior to 1928, the annual appropriation for the maintenance and improvements of our rivers and harbors averaged from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 and for flood control about $10,000,000. In the 5 years prior to the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act, approximately $400,000,000 was expended on rivers and harbors, and $158,000,000 on flood control. The augmented program under the National Industrial Recovery Act, to the end, amongst other things, of ameliorating unemployment, has provided $250,000,000 for river-and-harbor improvements, which, with regular appropriations available to the Department, has resulted in a total of approximately $350,000,000 being available for obligation during this fiscal year. Of this sum about $256,000,000 has been allocated to improvements primarily in the interest of navigation; $73,000,000 has been allocated to flood-control projects. The funds cited have made possible the direct employment of over 60,000 persons and the indirect employment of something like 200,000.

Funds from the Administration of Public Works were received during the period from August 1, 1933, to the end of that year. A determined effort was made by the Corps of Engineers to expedite the preparation of plans and specifications so that work might be started without delay and maintained under vigorous prosecution. I am proud to report to you that at the present time practically this entire amount made available has been obligated, with work actively under way on all projects. This record, unprecedented, has been made possible only by the tireless and loyal efforts of a wide-spread organization of civilians and commissioned officers of Engineers, the very uncommon effort and loyalty of whom justifies the repeated public expression of my admiration and appreciation. The Department has also had the highly effective cooperation of the contractors who proceeded under many adverse conditions to start work promptly and to push it energetically. The speed with which this work was placed under way has not been at any expense of proper engineering study and design. The projects in execution have received the same careful attention in all engineering details that has characterized the work of the Department in the past. It ought to interest the public to know that this program is under way at an overhead expense of less than 4½ percent.

There are a total of 97 operations scattered throughout the United States now in execution under the supervision of the Engineer Department supported by allotments from the Administration of Public Works. A brief enumeration of the major projects will not be amiss, perhaps.

ATLANTIC COAST

On the Atlantic coast, 2 highway bridges and 1 railway bridge are under construction across the Cape Cod Canal to permit of widening to meet the increasing demands of navigation. In New York Harbor, 30-foot channels have been provided in Staten Island Sound, in Newark Bay, and in Jamaica Bay, and interior channels have been extended and facilities materially improved to accommodate the port's annual commerce of 170 million tons, valued at $10,000,000,000. The anchorage facilities at Boston have been enlarged. A 35-foot Delaware River channel to Philadelphia has been completed; this channel, at a depth of 25 feet, is under extension from Philadelphia to Trenton. The New Haven Harbor, James River, Charleston and Brunswick Harbors, the St. Johns River to Jacksonville, Fort Pierce Inlet and Miami Harbors, are all under improvement looking to better navigational facilities.

The major portion of the protected inland waterway route for small boats along the Atlantic coast is practically completed with work actively under way on the section from Cape Fear River to Charleston, S.C., and on the section from Jacksonville to Miami. Work has been started on the canalization of the Savannah River and of the Cape Fear River.

GULF COAST

On the Gulf coast, the 32-foot project for Mobile is essentially complete, and work is under way at Pensacola, Tampa, Gulfport, St. Andrews Bay, Brazos Island, Galveston, Houston Ship Channel, Texas City, Freeport Harbor, Port Aransas, and on the Sabine-Neches waterway. The Pensacola to Mobile Bay and New Orleans to Sabine River sections of the Gulf Intracoastal waterway have been completed and are open to navigation, with the new Harvey Locks opposite New Orleans providing a modern connection to the Mississippi River. Work is also under way on the Sabine River to Corpus Christi section of the Gulf Intracoastal. The flood control for the Lake Okeechobee region is a very important activity in this section on which material progress has been made in the past year.

PACIFIC COAST

On the Pacific coast improvements are in active progress at San Diego, Los Angeles, and Long Beach, San Francisco, Columbia River to Portland and Vancouver, Willapa River, Grays Harbor, Tacoma Harbor, Richmond Harbor, San Joaquin River, Wrangell Narrows, and on the great navigation and power dam at Booneville, Oreg. Flood control of the Sacramento River has been an important Federal project since 1910 and the Federal Government has already expended over $12,000,000 in its execution.

GREAT LAKES

On the Great Lakes increased depths have been secured, or contracted, at the important ports of Agate Bay, Duluth-Superior, Ashland, Marquette, Port Washington, Green Bay, Milwaukee, Calumet and Indiana Harbors, Lake St. Clair Channels, and at Toledo, Lorain, Sandusky, Cleveland, Ashtabula, Conneaut, Fairport, Huron, Buffalo, and Ogdensburg; the deepening and widening of connecting channels has been continued with the work completed, or well advanced, on the St. Mary's River, St. Clair River, Detroit River, and Niagara River.

INLAND WATERWAYS

The extension and improvement of our national waterway system has not been neglected in the Public Works program. The facilities on the Ohio River system, with its annual commerce of 30,000,000 tons, are under betterment by way of new locks and dams at Montgomery Island and Gallipolis, replacing six of the existing locks and dams; on the Kanawha, by the construction of two new locks and dams; and on the Green and Barren, the Allegheny, the Cumberland, and the Illinois waterway.

A large flood control and navigation storage reservoir is in construction on the Tygart River which will ameliorate the floods and increase low-water discharge of the Monongahela River. The upper Mississippi project has been greatly extended by completion of 3 locks and dams and of 13 other locks well under way. The 6-foot channel from the mouth of the Missouri River to Kansas City has been opened to navigation and is being rapidly extended to Sioux City. The construction of the huge storage reservoir at Fort Peck, Mont., designed to insure an adequate low-water supply for a channel 8 to 9 feet in depth is being pushed vigorously.

Important Territorial ports of Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and Alaska are likewise being improved under this program.

The brief summary above given comprises but major projects. In addition, there are a great number of lesser ones, in the sense that the expenditures involved are comparatively small, which will contribute materially toward increased transportation savings and better navigational conditions.

FLOOD CONTROL

Progress on the authorized flood-control projects on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, on the Sacramento River, and on Lake Okeechobee and the Caloosahatchee River has been substantially accelerated as part of the Public Works program. In addition, a flood-control project on the Winooski River, Vt., is in execution with personnel of the Civilian Conservation Corps, under the direction of the Engineer Department. As well, an extensive cooperative flood-control plan is being placed under way in the Muskingum Valley, Ohio, with a Federal contribution of $22,900,000. The first major allotment of funds received from the Administration of Public Works was $7,000,000 for the Mississippi flood-control plan, and within a week over 3,000 men were at work. Total allotments from the Public Works Administration combined with regularly appropriated funds have made an aggregate of approximately $70,000,000 available for this project during the present fiscal year and has enabled an extension of its protective value to thousands of lives and to property of tremendous value.

The Department has prepared and placed before the Administration of Public Works a list of projects which, if consummated, would complete all navigation and flood-control plans reported to Congress. The number of projects in this list total 184. Funds in the amount of $342,000,000 could be used advantageously for their prosecution during the next few years.

A study and analysis of the commercial statistics and costs of our harbor facilities show that our water commerce reached a maximum in 1929 of over 880 million tons. This commerce has, of course, been somewhat reduced during the years of economic depression. But there is no reason to doubt a resumption of our expanding water-borne transportation with the end of this depression period. Our commerce of 880 million tons was carried on waterways maintained by the Federal Government at a total cost of less than 3½ cents per ton. Our inland rivers, canals, and connecting channels showed a similar commerce in 1931 of over 677 million ton-miles, with maintenance charges of less than 3 mills per ton-mile. These figures, I believe, exhibit clearly the significance of our navigation waterways as related to the very commercial existence of the Nation. The Federal disbursements for maintenance of the system, as reflected in commercial tons, or ton-miles, of traffic, fully demonstrate the low cost to the Government, and the great benefit to the Nation, derived from its investment in the improvement of these facilities.

When I came to Washington last fall as Chief of Engineers, I was, of course, familiar with the River and Harbor Act of January 21, 1927, assigning to this Department the duty of making surveys in accordance with House Document No. 308, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, with a view to the formulation of general plans for the most effective improvement of navigable streams of the United States and their tributaries for the purposes of navigation, the development of water power, the control of floods, and the needs of irrigation, since I had been in intimate contact with many of the field investigations. In addition, I knew of the many river-and-harbor investigations undertaken by the Department under congressional authorization. I had no conception, however, of the extent of the data derived from these sources and the amazing amount of detailed information available to the Department on the water resources of the country.

Two hundred streams have been investigated under the provisions of House Document No. 308.

The majority of these surveys have been reported to Congress. This information has been invaluable to the Engineer Department, and to the other Departments, in the formulation of the Public Works program, and with the additional data available from special investigations, represents perhaps the most comprehensive study of the natural water resources of a country ever undertaken. Federal projects totaling $99,000,000 have been adopted by the Administration of Public Works, founded on plans contained in these surveys, and the assembled data have materially aided that Administration in its study of possible proposals. Based upon the reports referred to, and with other data available to the Department, we have drawn up a comprehensive list of projects, 1,600 in number, with a total estimated construction cost of $8,000,000,000. The physical features of the projects and their value to the public interests affected are set forth in the reports of the engineering investigations. The financial arrangements and the authorization necessary for the initiation of construction work remain to be provided. For each project listed the ratio of cost to benefit, and the estimated land and damage costs, is indicated. Some of these projects do not appear to be so favorably situated at this time with respect to cost and benefits. But it is obvious that the relation between the costs and benefits is a changing function. For example, growth in population adds to the importance of flood-control works by increasing the damages from overflow and correspondingly the benefits of protection; irrigation installations, which may not be desirable at the moment, may become so by reason of increases in population or greater demands for additional agricultural lands; it may be advantageous for those now occupying worn-out lands to shift to more fertile fields which, by irrigation or otherwise, insure to the cultivator a larger margin of profit; water-power projects may be advisable or not, depending upon fluctuating demands; markets for power depend both upon the prospects of industry and population and upon the costs of power from other sources. Any of these factors may change at any time.

If power can be generated and delivered sufficiently cheap, the development of a market will be hastened. As the population of the United States expands, economical transportation will become more and more necessary, and the demand for improved navigation facilities will follow. If the past is a criterion of the future, prosecution of many of these projects will be urged at an earlier date than is now generally realized.

Engineering plans for many of the projects in question are given in exhaustive reports of the investigations and surveys to which reference is made, covering a period of 7 years. It should be manifest that complicated technical studies of this nature and magnitude could be effectively conducted only by a closely knit organization composed of personnel equipped with skill, judgment, and integrity, and supervised and controlled by a single directing administrative head, in other words, an organization such as the Corps of Engineers.

The digestion of such a mass of detail as is involved in their engineering studies, and the acquirement of a ground knowledge of the characteristics of the myriad localities concerned, would demand many years of repeated effort and travel and calculation and cost. It is thought that the summation of the conclusions of the Army Engineer organization may be accepted as a reliable guide for the future development of the water resources and waterways of the country.

The actual annual rates at which expenditures should be made for the prosecution of the many projects studied by the Corps of Engineers should depend upon economic and employment conditions during different periods of time. These rates can be varied to meet the emergencies and fluctuating needs of such periods. would involve an annual construction cost of $160,000,000.

Please do not understand that I am recommending at this time the adoption of such a great number of projects as discussed. I merely desire to point out that the studies undertaken by the Engineer Department have been the means of preparing a list of such projects, specific in their elements and estimates, which may be regarded as appropriate for future selection and appropriation, and which might well be accepted as a guide for the comprehensive development over a period of years of our waterways in the combined interests of flood control, navigation, irrigation, and power.

In concluding I cannot express too strongly my conviction that the rivers and the harbors of the United States are among the Nation's greatest assets, and that their improvement by the Federal Government has been and will continue to be an unmixed blessing. The improvements that are needed and justified for navigation and for flood control by reason of the local and general benefits they will produce deserve your earnest attention and the attention of the public throughout the country.

I am grateful for the opportunity of addressing you and will hope that my remarks may be found to be helpful in the deliberations and conclusions of your convention.

NAZI PROPAGANDA

Mr. FOULKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOULKES. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a letter from the American headquarters of the Nazi organization, Friends of the New Germany, urging me to attend a mass meeting in Madison Square Garden, New York City, Thursday, May 17.

I shall not attend the gathering. I am, of course, firmly and unalterably opposed to nazi-ism and to any organization seeking to eulogize, defend, or excuse the evil doings of the vicious and oppressive government of Hitler. No more monstrous and barbarous regime has ruled a nation in modern times.

For the great mass of the German people—honest, thrifty, hard-working, and kindly folk possessing the sturdy virtues of a splendid race—I have deep respect. As a friend of the German people—and of the peoples of all lands—I am necessarily the bitter foe of the cruel and half-insane dictatorship today exercised over them by Hitler. I shall be glad indeed when they throw off the yoke of this outrageous tyranny.

The mass meeting of the Nazi organization in New York is but a part of the sinister, subtle, and scheming propaganda being conducted throughout the United States by Nazi agents. Both in military groups actually engaged in drills with arms and in groups using camouflaged names and pretending altruistic purposes, the Nazi-ists are seeking to build up a terroristic army in this country that can some day be used for the establishment of an American Hitlerism.

I have already called attention to the letters sent to Congressmen praising Dr. William A. Wirt, calling the "brain trust" too radical, and obviously the work of Nazi propagandists or of manipulators with similar objectives. These letters have come from Binghamton, Norwich, Cherry Valley, and other points in New York, from Benton Harbor, Detroit, and Niles in Michigan, and from cities and towns in other States.

We should be keenly on the alert against this insidious effort to mold the minds of people and to deceive them with cunning and specious misrepresentations, and we should watch with eagle eye the unscrupulous machinations of Hitlerites in America.

THE VINSON BILL AGAINST WAR

Mr. FOULKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOULKES. Mr. Speaker, the peace policy does not satisfy those who revel in destruction and find pleasure in despair. It may not satisfy the fire-eater or the swashbuckler [laughter and applause], but it does satisfy those who worship at the altar of the god of peace. It does satisfy the mothers of the land; but, my friends, this policy does satisfy the mothers of the land at whose hearth and fireside no jingoistic war has placed an empty chair. It does satisfy the daughters of this land, from whom brag and bluster have sent no husband, no sweetheart, and no brother to the moldering dissolution of the grave. It does satisfy the fathers of this land and the sons of this land, who will fight for our flag and die for our flag when reason primes the rifle.

My colleagues, the peace policy does not satisfy these junkers; if we fight for every degree of injury, this means perpetual war, and this is the policy of these war junkers—deny it if you can. Their policy would allow the United States to keep the sword out of the scabbard as long as there remains an unrighted wrong or an unsatisfied hope between the rising and the setting of the sun. It would make America as dangerous to itself and to others, as destructive and uncontrollable as a raging maniac. They would give us a war abroad each time the fighting cock of the European weathervane shifted with the breeze. They would make America the cockpit of the world. It would mean the reversal of our traditional policy of government.

How long do you suppose we would be allowed to meddle in European affairs while denying Europe the right to meddle in American affairs? The policy of the war junkers is a dream. It never could be a possibility. Their claim is not even advanced in good faith; it is simply a demand for funds for war profits wrung from the aching hearts of the people. Rome in all her glory tried it; Portugal, once the policeman of the world, tried it; Spain tried it; and they all crashed to a devastating ruin under the system. We should profit by the experience of the ages and avoid ambitions whose reward is sorrow and whose crown is death.

In their greed and desperation for unholy profits they try to create an issue out of national honor. Surely this high emotion should not be twisted into gaining unholy profits for the war junkers and desolation and death for the unprotected masses. Where and from whom do these junkers receive their commissions as keepers and interpreters of the honor of this Nation? Who gave them a monopoly of the brain or the emotions of the human heart? What rights do they possess which nature has denied to other men?

They proceed on the theory that the noisiest man in the land is the best patriot in the land.

These Junkers, fearful within, blustering without—they whistle to keep up their courage and hope the world will read in their faces what is not in their hearts. The real warrior today is the man of peace, who neither whistles to deceive his neighbors nor flaunts his patriotism to win the Pharisee's crown of self-praise. When danger confronts this Nation and its citizenship is outraged, the man of the street, the toiler in the fields, the artisan in the shops, the man who shoulders his musket and marches away at his country's call will need no one to tell him, no one to show him where duty lies and manhood calls. The men who do the fighting will demand no slimy war contracts with unholy profits wrung from the desolation and misery of their fellow neighbors.

Compared with the blood-smeared pages of Europe our records are comparably clean. Stolen wealth does not fill our Treasury or ravished territory swell our domain. Our greatness has been built on the resources of nature and the toil of our people. The song of the reaper, not the dying shriek of the soldier—the mart of trade, not the crack of the rifle, has won us our place in the sun.

These men came from the ranks of democracy as silently as Putnam left his plow, and back to democracy they go as silently as the southern heroes whose horses Grant returned.

These self-seeking profiteers and war junkers talk of national honor as if by some divine commission they had been appointed to this high place. If this be national honor, then let us wreck the Public Treasury and bind all men in bondage and chain them to the chariot of Mars, the god of war. No, no, my friends; real honor and real dishonor can be felt, and are felt, by the lowliest toiler in the land as acutely and as accurately as by even a great lawyer or a Presidential candidate. It is an elemental instinct which knows without knowing why and which enables even the unschooled to know right from wrong, justice from injustice, principle from prejudice, and passion from reason. When the honor of our country is outraged the people will know it without any political leader or war junker telling them. When our country is assailed, the great mass of people who will have to do the fighting will not have to be called to war. They will call themselves to war. These profiteers who are constantly inciting our people to war to swell their own coffers—but who spend their own time safely removed from peril—in society saloons, in libraries, as swaggering devotees of fashion—who would fight our battles on the carpet of parlor trenches or in restaurants and clubs or amid the dangers of afternoon teas—are all in favor of huge appropriations for destruction of life; but the men who must fight where the cannon roars and the bullet sings and death stalks—their wives, their sons, and their daughters, and the mothers who gave them being, all know that "peace on earth, good will to man" is the path that leads to human happiness.

The last war set the world aflame and stopped the march of progress for a century. Would anyone have it so again, in order to flaunt our war strength and assert "virile Americanism"? Is this the much-talked-of "national honor"? Is this the prize for which we sacrificed our best youth and thrust sorrow into every home? Is this the glittering bauble for which we gave 12,000,000 human lives? Is this the thing that makes might right and repudiates the doctrines of the lowly Nazarene? Is this the "Sermon on the Mount"?

The passions of men die; the truth lives. The sublimest picture in history is that of a plain American citizen striving with the weapons of reason and humanity against the navies and armies of the contending nations and bringing them in accord with the principles of international law. The standard of peace and justice now floats in the air of freedom and is enshrined in the hearts of our people. The matchless craft of a real pacifist not only will avoid war but will also lead the world into the ways of universal peace. What is peace but the assertion of moral progress? From the smouldering ruins of a thousand cities, over the graves of millions of brave men, out of the blackness of battle smoke, the people of the earth recognize the dim outlines of the soul of America in the patient and humane wisdom of the Man of Peace.

Of what avail is the wealth of our beloved land if it must be consumed in the destructiveness of war? Of what profit the travail of human progress for 10,000 years, had not the influence of the schoolmaster and the Christian teacher been felt? Their achievements to elevate the minds of men are as naught if they are cast into the cruel maws of war. But the plain millions, of all creeds and nationalities, recognize in their efforts the imperishable glories of a Christian civilization. It glorifies the peasant and the king alike. The schoolmaster becomes the statesman; the minister becomes the emancipator; the emancipator, the pacificator of the world.

Thus do nations accomplish the destiny of democracy. The commanding fact of the modern age is the spread of intelligence. The schoolhouse has conquered ignorance. The printing press has transformed the purposes of man. Education has qualified him for a better existence. The Bible has made him a moralist. Men know now that the world is big enough to support the human family in peace and comfort. In America justice has made its greatest progress because all men have a part. War cannot stop this inevitable march. The best opinion of the best men, by the force of example and mutuality of interest, becomes the opinion of all men.

Out of the ruins and sufferings of the last great mistake will arise a temple of justice whose dome will be the blue vault of heaven; its illuminant, the eternal stars; its pillars, the everlasting hills; its ornaments, the woods and bountiful fields; its music, the rippling rills, the sound of the birds, the laughter of happy childhood; its diapason, the roar of industry; its votaries, the people of the earth; its creed, on which hang all the laws of the prophets, "Do unto thy neighbor as unto thyself." On the walls of the National Museum hangs a picture of the famous warriors who had struck terror into the heart of mankind at various periods of history. Alexander the Great is there, Caesar is there, Hannibal is there, Napoleon is there, and on each side of this sinister group lie in endless rows the sheeted dead of war.

A vision arises before my mental gaze, representing hands, myriads of hands, humanity's hands from the grave, hands stretching up toward the sky, gnarled hands of labor and withered hands of age, eager hands of youth and helpless hands of babes, rugged hands of men and delicate hands of women—hands of aspiration, stretching upward to the sky from divine inspiration toward happiness and peace.

These two pictures symbolize the question. One need not believe blindly in peace, but surely all Christian men and women must believe profoundly in it. The responsibility for war rests with government, but its penalties fall on untold millions of guiltless people. A practice which calls for wholesale killings of human beings must surely meet with the disapproval of Christian people. The individual and family loss cannot even be dreamed of. The flower of our manhood is seized and crushed and the physical and mental caliber of posterity thereby decreased. The best are selected for death or wounds, insanity, and crippling, and the next generation consists largely of children of the weaker. It is not only fiendishly cruel but hopelessly inefficient. Let the war junkers follow the lords of war, who ride among the corpses of mankind. Let the great heart of our church people follow the path of peace, which leads to the inspiration of humanity that aspires to higher things.

RIVER-AND-HARBOR DEVELOPMENT

Mr. FOULKES, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOULKES. Mr. Speaker, the announcement that the existing system of river-and-harbor development is likely to be abandoned at the suggestion of Secretaries Wallace, Ickes, Dern, and Perkins; that a new nationally coordinated system will probably be substituted; and that the Board of Army Engineers may be eliminated, with regional boards under a central authority, substituted, is a welcome one. I am heartily in favor of the proposal.

A board of scientific men, who are thoroughly familiar with river-and-harbor matters, flood control, and related topics, is needed to supervise these important matters.

Control of waterway development by a board of military chiefs with the militaristic caste of mind is undemocratic and unintelligent. The custom of letting generals and colonels govern river-and-harbor improvements and maintenance is a silly and an unjustifiable one. The war-makers have had too much to say about governmental affairs for a long time and it will be a commendable step in the right direction if they are required to surrender some of their power and take a back seat. What is required in this instance is a board with scientific and technical ability, not a group of men with jingoism and sabre-rattling uppermost in their minds.

River-and-harbor expansion has for years been a sort of "racket" in the hands of the men whose principal delight is international slaughter. The abolition of the Army Engineering Board, composed of aristocratic West Point graduates and thinking more of the next war than of peacetime development of our waterways, is to be highly recommended.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H.J.Res. 332. Joint resolution to provide appropriations to meet urgent needs in certain public services, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 326) referring the claims of the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians of North Dakota to the Court of Claims for adjudication and settlement.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S.Con.Res. 14. Concurrent resolution authorizing the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in the enrollment of H.R. 8617, the legislative appropriation bill, to make a correction in Senate amendment no. 21.

PERMANENT AND INDEFINITE APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes in order to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention, and never the practice, of the Committee on Appropriations to suddenly spring any bill of length and complexity on the House. Therefore I take this occasion to notify the House that a suspension of the rules will be moved on the bill, H.R. 9410, on next Monday. This is a bill on which a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations has put in 6 weeks very hard work, dealing with permanent and indefinite appropriations. That subcommittee consisted of Messrs. GRIFFIN, MCMILLAN, PARKS, CARY, GOSS, and WIGGLESWORTH. Never in my life have I known a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations to put in such painstaking and sincere work on any bill.

It develops there is no difference of opinion in that subcommittee about the salutary effect that will result in the passage of this bill. It was reported to the main Committee on Appropriations this morning. There was no difference in that committee. They heard the Comptroller General and others interested, and the Comptroller General unhesitatingly says that permanent, indefinite appropriations produce extravagance and uncertainty, and divest Congress of all control over appropriations or accounting as to how the money is expended, and whether its continued expenditure is on worth-while projects.

Therefore, I ask those interested to read the report, which is available, or to read such part of the hearings, as you desire, which are also available. If you will read only Mr. McCarl's testimony in whom we all have confidence, you will be convinced.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill stops 367 indefinite, permanent appropriations, does it not?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Correct; 367 of them; and some of them as old as 1799.

Mr. BLANTON. And by stopping this money from going out of the back door of the Treasury, where to nobody knows, and forcing all money to come through the front door of the Treasury, with Congress investigating and passing on each sum, this bill will save this Government eventually millions of dollars each year. There ought not to be a vote against this bill. I heartily endorse all that my colleague from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] has said about it.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BACON. As ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations, I wish to endorse everything the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] has just said.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thank the gentleman.

SECURITIES EXCHANGE BILL OF 1934

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 9323) to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 9323, the securities exchange bill, with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, this measure is a new venture in Federal regulation. I do not regard it as premature. I regard it as tardily recognizing conditions that make it the duty of the Federal Government to regulate such matters. The reason for this legislation, as I view it, is amply demonstrated by a history of our economic developments in the past 15 years. We have been passing through a new economic period in our country. Stock exchanges have become the market places of the Nation. A large portion of the wealth of the country represented by stock certificates and bonds finds its market in these stock exchanges. The list prices of the stock exchanges are published even in fourth-class newspapers of the Nation. All over the United States hundreds of thousands of American citizens read those papers. They hurriedly pass over the glaring headlines that may tell of the latest sensations, to read the news of the stock market. They are interested, because they are investors or speculators to an unusual degree. It is claimed that 10,000,000 people, citizens of this Republic, scattered to the remotest sections, are holders of shares, and interested in the market on the exchanges.

This bill, although it is called a bill to regulate national security exchanges, is much broader in its practical operation. In fact, the object of this measure is not merely to regulate the exchanges—that is only incidental to its purpose. The real purpose of this regulatory measure is to protect the investors of the United States against fraud and imprudent investments, and to give integrity to the securities by the sale of which American business must be financed.

The great abuses that have occurred through the use of the stock market in recent years is illustrative of the fact that power always carries with it susceptibility to abuse. The stock exchange is not a reprehensible organization in the business life of our country. It is not an unnecessary burden on the business of the Nation. It performs a very useful service. It is the outgrowth of the development of the economic forces of this country.

Above everything else, this is the corporate age of America. This is the age in which people have resorted to corporate investments as the most practical and in many respects the most desirable manner of carrying on the business of the United States.

It is estimated that about half the wealth of the United States is represented by the securities issued by corporations and by the wealth that is in the banks in the form of deposits. These security exchanges afford a liquid market that has no comparison in the past history of the world. A large percentage of the total wealth of America, as illustrated by the bonds and stocks of corporations, has a definite price on the exchanges today and every business day of the year. It may be a manufacturing plant in New Jersey, a sugar-production plant in Utah, or a gold mine in Alaska, but they are alike financed through a stock exchange in a distant city. Every day in the year, at least, at some cash price the securities of that corporation are salable. Every holder of these stocks and bonds knows that he can convert them into cash today at whatever may be the price on those exchanges.

A system which gives liquidity to a large proportion of the investments of the American people is a marvelous institution. I do not say this in praise; neither do I say it in condemnation of the exchange. I state the fact. We must properly appraise this function of the exchange in order to pass legislation to regulate and control, not for the purpose of destroying but for the purpose of protecting, for the constructive purpose of conserving the business of the United States. If this legislation is successful in carrying out the purpose for which it is designed, it will give greater stability, more credence, and greater integrity to the stocks listed on the exchanges of the country. They will be more valuable.

The stocks and bonds of the corporations and the bank accounts of this country constitute liquid assets and a convenient form of investment. Before the corporate phase of American business developed, the man with a few hundred or a few thousand dollars at his command was frequently at a loss to know what to do with it. The chances were he did not have sufficient money with which to go into business on his own account, or if he had sufficient money, did not have the business experience and perhaps not the time to manage a small business. In recent years, under quantity production, expanding trade and industries, the stock market has invited him to become a purchaser of its securities. The stock market furnished a convenient method of investing with the hope of security and a prospect of a fair or possibly a speculative return.

A problem that will more acutely develop, particularly if this bill functions as intended, will be the tendency of the stock markets to drain credits from local investments. I take it the best investment the citizen can make is a local investment. Where an individual invests his money in a local enterprise, he builds up his local community, adds to local labor employment and community progress, and does more for the country than by contributing to the financing of the great business organizations of the country with remote control. This was one of the great difficulties in 1929. The stock markets drained local credit throughout the United States and caused an unbalanced credit situation which weakened our stability from the financial standpoint. Our people were turning away from safe investments to the more enticing and uncertain rewards of speculation.

It is well to realize that today the vast wealth invested in stocks, bonds, corporate securities, and bank deposits represents nearly one half the wealth of the United States and involves the separation of ownership and control. At no other time in the history of the world has there been such a vast proportion of the wealth of a nation invested in undertakings where ownership and control were separated. We have had this remarkable situation in the United States. It means that those in control of our great corporations, those who issue and control these securities, those who sell these stocks and profit from their transfer, are not the people who primarily suffer from fraud or imprudent investments these stocks may represent. There is the greatest temptation that managements have ever had to be unfaithful to their trusts.

In the main, the men controlling these great corporations are not large owners of the stocks of the corporations they control. Too often they have yielded to the temptation to control these great business institutions to their own interests, and with a zeal out of proportion to the loyalty they have shown their stockholders. Thus in recent years we have seen the directors of corporations, without the knowledge of their stockholders, voting themselves vast bonuses out of all proportion to what legitimate management would justify. We have had revelations of salaries paid to directors and officers of great corporations which showed shameful mismanagement; which showed that the men in charge of some of these corporations were more concerned in managing its affairs for their own benefit than for the benefit of the stockholders. The history of the past few years has revealed that in a number of instances these unconscionable bonuses and unconscionable salaries exacted from the stockholders were continued notwithstanding the fact that dividends were cut, and notwithstanding the fact that in some cases the common-stock holders were deprived of any dividends. We have had the ugly picture of corporate officials juggling with the stocks of their own companies, preying on their own stockholders through inside information they obtained as trustees of the trust they violated.

One of the most serious phases of this indirect or remote control of capital by those who are not the owners is lack of contact. In the old days when the man in charge of a local corporation committed an offense, embezzled the company's money, or conducted the company's business in an unconscionable way, he was branded in the local community. He lost his prestige, and the victims of his mismanagement or fraud were known to the community. Their suffering was present and visible. At the present time, however, under remote stock transactions, the victims of mismanagement of a corporation are remote from those who inflict the injury, the associates of the perpetrator do not ostracize or upbraid him. The victims are unseen by those who inflict their injuries. This bill proposes to hold these wrongdoers to a higher degree of responsibility.

This measure, as I suggested, goes a good deal further than the regulation of stock exchanges. The purpose of the bill is not simply the regulation of stock exchanges. It proposes the protection of the investor against fraud, to give more integrity to securities listed on the exchanges. To accomplish these purposes we must follow the stock from its issuance to the hands of the purchasers. The question of the integrity of the management of the corporation is involved; the question of the prudence of the investment represented by the stock is involved.

We do not mean that the Federal Government will attempt to substitute its judgment for the judgment of the stockholder in the matter of determining the prudence of the investment. That is a problem which must be assumed by the investor and of which the Government does not try to relieve him; but it is the problem of the Federal Government under the theory of this bill to require that when the corporation registers its stock on an exchange it must make a full and complete revelation of all facts that legitimately affect its securities. The information which corporations are required to give by this bill do not materially differ from that required by the New York Stock Exchange at this time. I take it, the first substantial step toward securing effective regulation is to require a complete revelation of all material facts that an investor should know in order to invest his money properly.

When these market exchanges are open for the investors of the Nation the Government has a right to expect that the corporations whose stocks are listed there and offered to the public will give truthful information and make a full revelation of the facts tending to show the merits or the demerits of their stock. Without giving such information their stocks are not entitled to the credence which listing should carry.

When it comes to the exchanges themselves, this bill provides for their regulation. We recognize that an exchange is a private institution. It is run for the profit of its members. Yet it performs a useful function of value to the people of the United States. It aids business by giving a market and by giving liquidity to this vast portion of the wealth of our country. We require that the exchange shall register and give full information as to its set-up to the commission that will administer this law. We require that the exchanges shall agree to enforce compliance by their members of all the regulations and rules of the commission. They agree to submit to regulation themselves. They agree that the exchanges will, if necessary, change their rules with reference to membership or in reference to stocks and other matters, so as to conform to the requirements of the regulatory commission.

These exchanges must not be charged with all the sins that have occurred in connection with the sale of stock in recent years. If I undertook to try to fix the responsibility for the debacle that came to the stock market since 1929 I would not attempt to place my finger on the exchanges and blame them alone. I recognize the part they played in the matter, but I also recognize another man who is very largely responsible for the misfortunes of the country and the excessive stock speculation and debacle. That is Mr. American Citizen who wants to get something for nothing. He had a large part in the misfortunes of the American people in reference to the stock speculation.

However, that is no answer to the purposes of this bill. This bill cannot do everything. It does not attempt that, but it does attempt to perform a useful service, to insist on reliable information to the investor.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. LEA of California. These stock exchanges are the bottle necks through which these certificates flow after they are issued by the corporation and before they reach the ultimate investor. This furnishes an opportunity to control and regulate that may serve a useful purpose to the Nation.

We must first go to the corporation that issues the stock and look into the prudence and integrity of that corporation. Then we must go to the exchange where this stock is sold; then to the broker and the dealer who handle these stocks, and some of whom have been guilty of the manipulative practices of recent years. Then we must look into the question of the credit advanced and on which the stock is floated in the markets of the United States.

The Government in connection with every city assumes responsibility for its water supply. It assumes the responsibility to see that the water supply is clean, drinkable, and beneficial to the public. Here we have this great market supply of the Nation. In this bill the Federal Government attempts to assert its regulatory powers to keep as clean and trustworthy as possible this vast flow of stocks from the corporations to the investors and business life of the United States.

When we come to the question of the broker and the dealer, a good deal of controversy was involved as to what control should be established; whether or not these positions should be separated; whether or not we would permit a man to act in the capacity of both broker and dealer; whether or not we should permit floor trading or permit specialists to be on the floor; and other problems.

In attempting to deal with these questions I am candid to admit that the committee proposed to confer a large regulatory power on the regulatory commission.

There were two reasons for this: The first was that we recognized we are not experts and tried to act with a caution becoming our inexperience. Where in doubt as to what should be done, we thought better to resolve the doubt in favor of maintaining the present business practices than to establish some fixed rule that might prove unfortunate. In the second place, where we gave the regulatory commission the power, it would be a flexible power. If the commission finds a mistake has been made, it can readily change its rules to more favorable ones and thus accomplish the purposes of Congress.

The manipulative practices that have so stigmatized the stock market in recent years revolve largely around the broker and the dealer. This bill is severe in its denunciation and penalties for manipulative violations of the law. It not only prescribes criminal penalties for those who engage in these manipulative practices, but it also gives a civil suit in behalf of the man who is the victim of such practices. It is going to be dangerous for a man to engage in window dressing, fraudulent and deceptive methods for the purpose of defrauding investors. This bill proposes to punish persons guilty of fraudulent statements in reference to stocks listed on these national exchanges where damage results.

There has been a great deal of controversy about the question of controlling credit as it is embodied in the margin sections of this bill. Restrained credit is not primarily for the benefit of the purchaser of the stock. It is not necessary from the standpoint of the broker. It is necessary for the business welfare of the Nation, for its vital need of credit protection.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WOLVERTON].

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, the subject matter of the bill (H.R. 9323) now under consideration presents more intricate and a greater variety of problems affecting the economic, financial, and individual welfare of our people than any legislation heretofore presented at this session of Congress.

PROPAGANDA

The wide-spread interest manifested throughout the country is not entirely due to propaganda alleged to have been instigated by opponents of the measure; although I can say that the propaganda against this bill has been more highly organized and more extensive than any I have ever previously experienced. However, the fact remains that beneath the deluge of inquiries and protests received by every Member of Congress there has been an apparent and unmistakable fear that in some way or other the proposed legislation would adversely affect the business enterprises of our Nation.

While it is true that the original bill did contain some provisions that might create an honest concern upon the part of thoughtful business men, yet, I am inclined to believe that statements, unwarranted in many instances, originating from prominent business men have had more to do with creating this psychology of fear than the actual provisions of the bill. [Applause.]

PROTECTION OF LEGITIMATE BUSINESS

I wish to assure the Members of the House that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has not been insensible to the necessity of taking every precaution to preclude even the possibility of curing one evil by creating another or greater one. And, for the further assurance of the House permit me to say that in our consideration of the many vital questions or problems that we were called upon to decide there has been no division of thought along strictly party lines. The uppermost thought that has dominated our individual and collective decisions has been a desire to correct existing evils, or conditions that have proved harmful, without destroying, curtailing, or handicapping legitimate business.

And, in this connection, I wish to express my appreciation of the faithful and conscientious endeavor of our chairman [Mr. RAYBURN] to present to this House legislation on this important subject that would prove beneficial to the public interest. [Applause.] At all times he was fair, open-minded, and willing to give every opportunity to the members of the committee to present conflicting viewpoints. His attitude of fairness to the members of the committee and interested parties desiring to be heard, is still further emphasized by his request to the Rules Committee for an open rule whereby the membership of the House is likewise given the opportunity to express their viewpoint and offer amendments to the bill. It is a pleasure and a privilege to hold membership on a committee that is willing, under the leadership of its chairman, to submit its work on a matter as important as this to the House for approval in a manner that does not preclude the fullest expression of opinion. [Applause.] Similar procedure should likewise be adopted for the consideration of all important legislation. Such a course is in accord with the dignity and intelligence of the House.

PREVAILING CONDITIONS REQUIRE ACTION

The need for legislation of this character is apparent to everyone who has given thoughtful and unbiased consideration to the underlying causes and conditions that brought about or culminated in the stock market catastrophe of 1929, with its attendant destruction of business and individual distress.

In 1929, at the peak of the security market, the total value of stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange alone, was nearly $89,000,000,000. In 1932, it had shrunk to less than $16,000,000,000. In those 3 years the average value per share of stock had declined from $89 to $12. Bonds listed on the exchange declined from $49,000,000,000 in September 1930 to $31,000,000,000 in April 1933. In addition to this enormous loss of value there must also be added the depreciation in value of stocks and bonds on other exchanges than the New York Stock Exchange, and the depreciation of all stocks, bonds, mortgages, real estate, and every class of securities throughout the country. It was the collapse of security values in 1929 and subsequent years that has resulted in the closing of nearly 6,000 banks in the United States, paralyzing business and bringing distress to millions of our people.

It may properly be said that the New York Stock Exchange was not the sole cause of these results, yet the fact remains that the practices prevailing on the exchange, prior to 1929, constituted a direct and contributing cause to the collapse of security values.

Wild and unrestrained speculation, made possible by highly organized pools and other manipulative practices, encouraged by false and misleading statements, influenced thousands of individuals to enter the stock market. They not only utilized their own savings, but borrowed large sums to finance their stock-market transactions. They had little, if any, information as to the real value of the stocks they traded in, and no knowledge of the intricacies of market practices. The vast majority were as innocent and gullible as lambs.

EXTENT OF STOCK-MARKET TRADING

As an indication of the extent to which stock-market speculation became a fascinating venture, it is only necessary to consider the rapidity and extent of increased trading in the years immediately preceding and including 1929.

In the 10 years before the World War the yearly transactions in stock on the New York Stock Exchange averaged about 155,000,000 shares. During this period the maximum day's trading was less than 3,000,000 shares. In 1925 the number of shares traded in had increased to 450,000,000, or approximately three times greater than the average for the pre-war decade. In 1929 the volume had reached the tremendous total of 1,125,000,000—an increase of 150 percent in 4 years and more than 700 percent over the pre-war period. During the busy days of 1929 the total number of shares bought and sold in 1 day reached as many as 16,000,000. In 1929, 1 day of such trading was equal to one third of the entire volume of trading for the year 1914. Or, expressed differently, 3 days of such trading in 1929 was equal in volume to the entire trading of the full year in 1914. And, astounding as it may seem, notwithstanding the experiences of the past, in the summer of 1933 there was a repetition of the orgy of speculation that characterized the year 1929, and in 1933, despite the depression, 654,000,000 shares were bought and sold on the New York Stock Exchange.

These contrasting figures indicate the constantly increasing public interest in stock-market transactions, and the necessity of controlling and regulating such exchanges to the end that the public interest shall be served and the investing public protected.

SPECULATIVE FINANCING

While unrestrained and unrestricted speculation played a large part in creating conditions that eventually contributed to the stock-market collapse of 1929, yet there is another condition closely identified with it that challenges our thoughtful consideration, namely, the extensive use of credit in financing stock-market transactions.

The report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce presents a striking analysis of the situation and the result that inevitably follows. Between 1922 and 1929 brokers' loans increased from one and one half billion to eight and one half billion dollars. Five billion dollars of this increase took place in 3 years, one and one half billion dollars in the last 3 months. In the crash of 1929 the same loans declined $3,000,000,000 in the first 10 days and $8,000,000,000 in the next 3 years. These figures alone will enable the economic historian of the future to describe the unhealthy prosperity of 1929 and the inevitable grief and suffering that followed in the succeeding years—grief and suffering that overwhelmed and carried away not merely the gains of speculative debauch, not merely the savings of those who had invested in securities, but eventually the savings of the frugal and thrifty who had deposited their funds in banking institutions, and finally destroyed the operating profits of every business in the country no matter how unrelated to stock exchanges.

To finance these stock transactions, and to provide funds for new security issues, of every conceivable kind and character, increased interest and other inducements were made that had the effect of drawing into this whirlpool of speculation the funds of local banks from the remotest parts of our country. These funds would otherwise have been utilized in financing local enterprises. When the bubble burst, the harmful effects were consequently felt in every locality throughout the land. The innocent suffered with the guilty. The individual who had deposited his or her life's savings in a bank, a building-and-loan association, or a home, felt the effect and suffered the loss, although he had never purchased a share of stock on any exchange. It is not necessary to pursue this thought any further to illustrate the necessity of preventing, as far as humanly possible, a recurrence of such conditions in the future.

FEDERAL REGULATION A NECESSITY

How, and by what means, can the public interest and the investing public be best served? Certainly, it cannot be by the abolition of exchanges. Their usefulness and necessity as a part of the highly organized economic and financial machinery of present-day business makes their continuation an absolute necessity. This fact is well and forcibly set forth in the summary of the research findings and recommendations of the stock market survey staff of the Twentieth Century Fund, wherein it is said:

> The security markets supply a means by which those who hold securities may exchange them for others or convert them into cash. The more effective the marketing processes become, the easier it is for owners of stocks and bonds to sell them. It is unnecessary to describe in detail the public as well as the private advantages of such a ready market. To clarify the picture, imagine the indescribable difficulties which would follow a condition in which the owner of high-grade stocks or bonds who wants to sell would meet the uncertainty and delay which faces the owner of real estate today if he is in need of ready cash. Such a situation would involve a complete revolution in banking and insurance, not to mention the financial affairs of millions of our people who hold securities.

If the stock market is to perform a useful as well as an essential service to the economic, financial, and business life of the Nation, it must be so conducted, by control or regulation in the public interest, as to insure a ready market for securities, with continuity of prices for securities as near as possible to the actual value.

To effect this purpose, the bill under consideration has four principal objectives, namely, (1) to establish Federal supervision over securities exchanges; (2) to prevent manipulation of security prices and to protect the public against unfair practices; (3) to prevent excessive fluctuations in security prices due to speculative influences; (4) to discourage and prevent the use of credit in the financing of excessive speculation in securities.

The necessity for Federal regulation and control of exchanges is made apparent by the inability of such exchanges, conducted as private institutions, to adequately control or eliminate the harmful practices that have grown up in dealing with securities, both within and outside of recognized exchanges. Furthermore, the business of buying and selling securities is largely interstate in character. Consequently, proper regulation and control must be found through Federal agencies rather than State.

PLAN OF REGULATION

The plan of regulation and control, set up under the provisions of this bill, makes it unlawful for any exchange to function as such or utilize any of the facilities of interstate commerce until it has first made application and received permission from the Federal authority set up for that purpose. And the granting of such right is further conditioned upon an agreement to comply, and to require its members to comply, with the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations set up thereunder by the Federal Commission. The penalties and actions provided are amply sufficient to require and insure strict compliance.

A question as to the right, power, or authority of Congress to legislate on the subject matter of the bill and in the manner proposed by the bill has been raised by eminent counsel. I am convinced, however, that the constitutionality of the method as well as the power of Congress to legislate for the purposes set forth in the bill has well been sustained by a brief submitted to the committee by Thomas C. Corcoran and Benjamin V. Cohen, who have also faithfully and ably assisted the committee in its consideration of the intricate problems directly and indirectly related to the subject matter of the proposed legislation. If it be true, as stated, that these young men are part of the so-called "brain trust", then I can testify that there has been no misnomer in so doing. [Applause.] They have each shown rare ability and fidelity in the performance of their duty and have rendered a most worth-while service in this important matter of legislation.

NO IMPROPER REGULATION OF BUSINESS

Aside from the constitutional feature, the next most important question that has been raised against the bill is that with respect to whether or not its provisions place an undue or improper burden upon legitimate business enterprises.

Whatever justification may have existed for this complaint as based upon the provisions of the original bill, there is no legitimate objection in the one now before this House. This bill requires no information to be given by issuers of securities traded in on a stock exchange other than what is essential and necessary to properly and fully inform the investing public as to the merits of the particular investment, and in no way, directly or indirectly, curtails or handicaps legitimate business in the fullest measure of management in the interest of its shareholders. It does preclude, however, the management of business enterprises from utilizing inside information to their own benefit without making such fact known to the shareholder. It, furthermore, seeks to make more difficult the use of official positions to self-perpetuate the controlling management, and thereby enables the individual stockholder in conjunction with others to have a more reasonable opportunity to change the management when occasion seems to justify. There is also a curtailment or restriction on the right to use surplus funds, by loans or otherwise, to finance or supply credit for stock-market speculation, and a requirement that full disclosure must be made of remuneration received by officers of the company, including any bonus.

Certainly there can be no proper complaint made to provisions such as these, the only purpose of which is to protect the investing public. Accurate knowledge of the financial condition of the security issuer and an assurance that full and true information is available to the small investor on the outsider as well as to the insider cannot help but produce a more ready and substantial market for securities.

MARGIN TRADING

Another feature of the bill that has met with considerable opposition is that which seeks to restrict or control margin trading as a speculative influence. It would be impossible to correct the evils incidental to stock-market operations without assuming jurisdiction to regulate or control margin trading. There is nothing more harmful to the maintenance of an orderly market or the continuity of price levels based upon actual investment value of securities than the upsetting influence of unrestrained or unrestricted speculation. Margin requirements have a direct relation to speculation. The amount of margin required can create or curtail speculation. No one denies it can be utilized either as an accelerator or a brake. Everyone, therefore, admits the necessity of providing some authority to regulate its use.

Some have held that this important function should remain in the hands of stock-exchange officials with some power given to the Federal regulatory body to supervise the stock exchange in its control of the matter. Others are of the opinion that the public interest demands that there shall be an entire separation of its control from private hands. I am of the opinion that the importance of the subject, as well as the difficulties to be otherwise encountered, require that a flexible power of control should be lodged in a Federal administrative authority with the fullest opportunity given to such authority, preferably the Federal Reserve bank, to raise or lower the margin requirements according as prevailing business conditions may seem to require and with due respect to different classes of securities and their earning possibilities. This latter method has been adopted by this bill except that it contains definitely fixed margin requirements as a declaration of congressional policy, but, in the final analysis, giving unrestricted discretionary authority to the Federal Reserve bank, because of its general supervision of the subject of bank credits, to raise or lower the margin requirements set forth in the bill. The Twentieth Century research staff had recommended to the committee the advisability of fixing margin requirements upon the basis of earnings of the security issuer. It was agreed that this method presented problems too intricate to be made a part of this bill at this time and required further study. In a former draft of this proposed legislation the Federal Reserve Board and associated agencies were directed to make such study and report the result of the same to the next session of Congress. I regret it was not made a part of this bill. However, the general direction to make reports annually by the agencies of government having to do with the administration of this act may be sufficient without specific direction to do so. I hope it may be so considered.

CONTROL OF STOCK-MARKET CREDIT

In order that the fullest control may be exercised at all times over loans and credits extended to stock-exchange members, brokers, and dealers for stock-market transactions, and thereby preclude undue or improper speculation, borrowing on registered securities—other than exempted securities—is determined by definite restrictions laid down by the provisions of the bill.

Furthermore, a broker is forbidden to commingle the securities of customers without their written consent; and in no event is he permitted to pledge customers' securities with those of persons who are not customers or under circumstances that will subject customers' securities to a lien in excess of the aggregate indebtedness of the customers. These provisions prevent a broker from risking the securities of his customer to finance his own speculative operations. The provisions of this section of the bill, together with the margin-requirement section, will prove a strong deterrent and preventive against unrestrained orgies of speculation in the future.

MANIPULATIVE PRACTICES

The need for regulation of stock exchanges and corporate securities having the benefit of the Nation-wide facilities afforded by such exchanges was revealed, if not already known, by the recent investigation conducted by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. Manipulative price-control methods were found to be practiced by corporate officers and others who utilized the stock-exchange facilities to advance their nefarious and unconscionable schemes.

The bill now under consideration recognizes and labels distinctly and unmistakably each and every such fraudulent and improper device heretofore used. In specific and plain language it makes unlawful (1) creating a false or misleading appearance of active trading in any security registered on the exchange; (2) to effect any transaction which involves no change in the beneficial ownership of such security; (3) to enter an order for the purchase or sale of a security with the knowledge that an order of substantially the same size, same price, and, at the same time has been or will be entered by or for the same or different parties; (4) to effect singly or jointly any transaction for raising or depressing the price of a security; (5) to induce the purchase or sale of any registered security by circulating the information that the price is likely to rise or fall because of market operations of any person conducted for the purpose of raising or depressing the price of such security; (6) to induce the purchase or sale of a security by knowingly making a false or misleading statement; (7) in contravention of prescribed rules and regulations to effect alone or jointly any transactions for the purpose of "pegging", "fixing", or stabilizing the price of a security, or any transaction to acquire any "put", "call", "straddle", or other option or privilege of buying or selling a security without being bound to do so, or, to endorse or guarantee any such. And, in addition to the declaration of criminal responsibility, there is also provided a civil liability in favor of any person injured by any such transaction. If anyone should desire to observe a real, genuine set of legislative teeth, he can do so by giving consideration to section 8 of this act.

There are many other important features of the bill which, if the time allotted had permitted, I would have discussed. Furthermore, the full and complete report, together with the exhaustive explanation of Mr. RAYBURN, chairman of the committee, make further detailed reference to the provisions of the bill unnecessary. While there may be some features with which I do not agree, yet a close study of the bill with an open mind will reveal that every care has been taken to adequately protect the public interest and give protection to the investor. Yet equal care has been taken to do no harm to legitimate business. Furthermore, I would like to assure employees of stock exchanges and those in other activities directly or indirectly incident thereto that whatever justification for fear of dismissal there may have been by reason of the provisions of the original bill, such does not exist in the present bill.

TYPE OF REGULATORY AUTHORITY

In conclusion, I wish to express my views with respect to the type of authority to be set up for the administration of the act. The bill provides that the authority for such administration shall be the Federal Trade Commission, and that the membership of the Commission shall be increased to 7 commissioners by the addition of 2 new commissioners, and that the Commission shall be divided into divisions of not less than 3 members each. The work of administering the provisions of this act and the Securities Act of 1933 to come under the jurisdiction of one of such divisions. There is much to commend this plan, inasmuch as the Federal Trade Commission already has exercised jurisdiction in industrial and other closely related subjects. However, I am of the opinion that as the administrative work to be pursued in the regulation and control of the exchanges and the jurisdiction to be exercised in the many matters related thereto require a high degree of technical skill and knowledge, that it would be more advantageous if the administration of the act should be placed in a Federal securities exchange commission to be composed of 5 members appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, not more than 3 members to be of the same political party, such commission to take over also the administration of the Securities Act of 1933. In either case, however, as the Dickinson report to the President set forth, after its study of the general subject matter of stock-exchange control:

> The staff of the agency must be specifically fitted for their tasks and the Commissioners charged with the work must be men of unusual qualifications who must hold the respect of the country; and such an agency should give continuous representations to the views both of the investing public and of the exchanges in an endeavor to provide that no hasty or ill-advised regulations would be promulgated by inexperienced men.

CREATING NEW CONFIDENCE IN SECURITY MARKETS

It is my hope and expectation that a wise and judicious administration of the provisions of this act will create a new confidence in the integrity of the security markets. The report of the Twentieth Century Survey and study, aptly states:

> If there were a justifiable belief that security markets actually were "free and open", that all buyers and sellers met on substantially equal terms, that the outsider was not victimized by the insider, that pool activities did not distort investment values, that brokers could be relied upon to give undivided loyalty toward their customers, that reckless speculation would not occur—if, in short, a new atmosphere of this sort could be created, the response would be a greater investment interest in securities and a consequent improvement in all phases of the security business.

It is needless to say that it has been the constant endeavor of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, throughout its long and tedious consideration of this subject, to produce a bill that will recreate confidence by an assurance that past evils cannot and will not occur again in the security market. We believe this bill will accomplish that purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY].

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been declared the most important piece of legislation to be considered by this Congress. It has excited thousands of columns of newspaper space, made boom business for the Post Office Department and the telegraph companies, has seized the interest of the public as few pieces of legislation have done—and has worked certain interests to the point where it has been said they would spend millions to have it cast aside.

All this has naturally intensified the interest of the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which has been considering the bill. That interest and that sense of its importance has driven us to go over it time and again, line by line, paragraph by paragraph, and page by page. We have called on representatives of all interests to help us, defenders of high finance from Wall Street, conservative investment bankers from all parts of the country, industrialists, lawyers, commercial bankers, and Government servants filling high posts in the Federal Reserve Board and other departments. Because of its importance, we have never attempted to hurry and we have never used or felt the partisan whip. Whenever reasonable doubts have existed, we have called a halt to discuss at full length the problem involved. Time and again the bill has been redrafted to meet the directions of the committee for further changes. I think the committee can be proud of the dispassionate and devoted effort it has given to the formulation of the bill which has been reported out. The time all this has required has been justified by the improvement which the existing bill represents over the much more drastic measure originally introduced as a basis for suggestion and hearings.

But on the other hand the very conscientiousness with which the bill has been reworked by the committee has, paradoxically, been largely the cause of the uneasiness about its provisions which have been described as existing in certain parts of the country and, according to my colleague, Mr. MERRITT, particularly in my own New England. In the first place, the changes of sections and even the complete redrafts of the bill have been too many and have succeeded each other too quickly for the public to follow and distinguish between them. I am still receiving protests which I am sure are based not on the bill which the committee has reported to the House, but on the bill which was originally introduced nearly 10 weeks ago. In the second place, the intervening 10 weeks have afforded a golden opportunity for propagandists. With their great resources and many contacts the stock exchanges were able to gather their forces and take full advantage of the public confusion over the terms of the bill. We are unfortunate in that our very conscientiousness has made things more difficult.

Two things particularly impressed me in the long hearings. One was the seeming inability of the brokers and big business men to consider the broader point of view of the whole social structure, and to understand the degree to which their own prosperity is completely tied up with a sound stability in the economic system as a whole. They seemed to realize so little the degree to which the prosperity of each of them depends upon the common good, and that if we do not learn somehow to hang together, we shall soon again, as in 1929–32, hang separately. As Chairman RAYBURN stated in his speech before the House yesterday, fundamentally it is impossible to have a bill which will completely satisfy those interests. They really want no bill at all.

Another thing about the hearings that impressed me to a considerable extent was the absence of those who suffered most during the period of financial madness. We were endeavoring to perfect a measure that would remove the possibility of future frauds, that would protect the little banks, the small industries, the business men of America, and the hundreds of thousands of individuals who have periodically been caught in the vortex of the waters of juggled finance, and there were none of them at court. Their representatives were a few Government servants and these men were roundly suspected and damned for their efforts.

I came to the conclusion that some of them were beyond the opportunity to testify, that others among them were indifferent because their faith in a Congress to meet the challenge was very slight, and the rest because they had lost their pride, their spirit was crushed, and their courage gone.

Some of these absentees would be the people who would again suffer most if we could not evolve some way of preventing a repetition of that nightmare. Here we are endeavoring to perfect a measure to remove the possibility that soon again, as in the years before 1929, the operations of a comparatively few irresponsible financial monarchs and their camp followers—monarchs who would later abdicate into bankruptcy like Livermore or into oblivion like Kreuger, or to a far-away place like Insull, and leave the common folks to work out of the mess without their help—might ruin the little banks, the small industries, the average business man, and the thousands of investor-speculators who are periodically caught in and pay the price for speculative madnesses which political reactionaries fatalistically regard as regrettable but inevitable fluctuations in the economic cycle. Almost a hundred witnesses and hundreds more of highly paid lawyers and agents appeared and lobbied directly or indirectly for the cause of those who dwell in high financial places. Only five or six Government employees, and a few other people, appeared for the hundreds of thousands of the solid little fellows.

Of course, we were not alone the representatives of those who lost when the masts and funnels of finance were shot away. We had, however, felt the evidence that would have been theirs had they testified, as we lived in the terrible times ourselves, and the finding of this committee, as it is presented for your final judgment this week, was based upon a desire to be fair to those men who labor in the money marts, and just to those who make this great financial business possible. It became very clear to me that there was a particular duty upon us, hearing in substance only one side in this great debate. We were in a sense compelled to represent that great inarticulate mass and in a sense to be their advocate in weighing the testimony so pressed upon us by well-paid lawyers for the other side.

I think that this Congress, so likely to hear only the side of the articulate big man, should be careful that it adopts a bill fair not only to those who operate financial markets with other people's money, but to those millions whose self-stinting thrift, and possibly pathetic faith in the integrity of those operators and in the stability of those markets, makes great financial business possible. And I feel that the bill as reported by the committee is fair enough in that way, and is effective, and should be adopted now.

Yesterday I heard my colleague from Connecticut, Mr. MERRITT, plead with you not to enact this bill into law at this session, because it might interfere with business, even though only indirectly, and because reviving business confidence might be disturbed by the existence of that possibility magnified into a real fear by clever propaganda. I have for

Mr. MERRITT a feeling of affection and regard that goes far beyond the warm feeling of good will that men who are friends feel toward one another. I tremendously admire him for the sincerity of his convictions, even as I disagree with him.

I know, and I understand, and I share the concern of my Connecticut colleague as he aims to protect the typical Connecticut business man from actual Government domination or from any reasonable fear of that domination. But I do disagree with him on the existence of any fair basis for fear, and on the wisdom of postponing this legislation because unjustifiable fears have been created.

For myself I want to declare that I am whole-heartedly for this bill in its present form. I am for it because I am firmly convinced that industry will have a haven of safety behind its ramparts, because it will no longer allow the small banks scattered over the land to be the unknowing tools and victims of a small financial clique run wild, because it affords once more a better chance to the small business man on Main Street, and because it gives a greater measure of protection to the unschooled small investor in every hamlet in America.

Honest and sincere men will arise on the floor of this House before the close of this debate, as my colleague did yesterday, and plead with you not to permit the enactment of a law that will tie the hands of industry, retard the flow of credit, and slow up the wheels of progress. Many of them will be blessed with a greater gift of words than I possess, and I regard the abilities of some of them so highly that I am sure there will be a plausability in their argument. I urge you to watch for the concrete case of where the bill does harm.

Among those who will express fear, both in this House and elsewhere, are other men of noble character and high purpose from my own State. For some of them I have a high regard. The difference between us—and it is a wide difference—is our opinion concerning the responsibility of government. Theirs is that philosophy of government so clearly and so pitifully exemplified in the days just before the Seventy-third Congress. Theirs is that governmental view which expresses the thought that it is unwise to try things heretofore untried. They belong to the old order and the old guard. They are the political reactionaries.

I am not in sympathy with the view which attacks these men or attacks the Mellons and the Morgans. From the law they know and the view they have, I am certain that theirs is no less a noble purpose than that of other men. I do, however, join in the attack upon the manipulation of our system of government by men of high finance, and I do join in the attack upon every set-up, whether it be in Wall Street or Pittsburgh, which permits an abuse of power by men who have been given that power by the sweat of another man's brow.

I think I can show in a few minutes that there is no ground for the fear that this bill will interfere with the conduct of business corporations. But right now let me say that I have no faith in a business confidence that is so tender a plant that it cannot stand the sunshine of immediate curative legislation for admitted existing abuses. I do not believe that any business recovery like the one through which we are rapidly passing can be ruined by a sound piece of stabilizing legislation designed to keep that recovery from running away like the boom of last year. A confidence that comes from the real knowledge that crazy stock-exchange speculation cannot again upset the balance of things is the only kind of confidence on which business can really build. A nervous postponement of necessary adjustments until an inevitable "next year" is a basis on which nothing can be built except the hope that political accident may make it impossible to pass any bill next year. This bill does not offer us any simplified choice of reform or recovery. We are in a situation where without reform there can be no sound recovery.

I do not believe that a generation should fatalistically suffer its woes in the sackcloth and ashes of passive acceptance, fearing to do anything but wait for the operation of so-called "economic natural laws" to restore prosperity to the next generation. I do not believe in changing our form of Government. But I do believe that this generation has the intelligence and resource to grapple with our problems as boldly and concretely, and as experimentally if need be, as our constitutional fathers grappled with their problems 150 years ago. That is part of the reason why I have long advocated a governmental regulation of working hours, and an old-age pension system.

I consider that the truly dangerous radical in times like these, when all the plans of a generation are standing at the forks of the road, is the disbeliever in our power to control our own economic destiny. I cannot comprehend the feeling of those who fatalistically shake their heads face to face with our admitted problem, remark on human futility, and have no recommendation but that things be allowed to work themselves out. In a thousand years' view of human history it perhaps makes no difference to the philosopher that this generation in Meriden and in New Haven, Conn., 1934, are trapped in a burning structure, while the philosophers watch the flames burn out and reflect that in another 10 years the workings of the natural laws of economics will create prosperity for another generation. But it means everything to those people in Meriden and in New Haven in 1934 to try to take hold of the situation and do some things for themselves now.

I represent an even more highly industrialized constituency than does Mr. MERRITT. Mine is a constituency of moderate-sized closely owned business firms, managed by those who have had to make profits while paying the highest wage scales in the country, and employing clear-headed, sober, intelligent workingmen who have tried to invest intelligently. It is a constituency of democratic decentralized industrial units which has tried to live by its own self-reliant standards and which has had very little part in the speculation of the rest of the country. But it has learned—and it was a bitter lesson—that the completely national scale on which our business and finance is now organized leaves the native conservatism of any community rather helpless before the speculation of less conservative communities. My New England constituency will not only be unharmed by the passage of this bill but gains from it the protection of its habitual methods of doing business and of investing money to a greater extent than practically any other section of the country. The small New England business man, who always operated on a cautious, stable basis, can only gain by control of the stream of credit which has upset his careful plans, and profits, by alternately flushing his huge poorly managed competitors with stock-market funds to expand in the fever of a boom—and leaving his market glutted with productive facilities when the boom collapsed. And I am convinced that there has been a direct relationship between the flotation of huge mergers on the basis of too easy stock-market credit and the tendency toward monopolization of industry which has gone on in the past 10 years to the destruction of the democratic decentralization and diversification of small industry on which New England stability is based.

I think the New England investor likewise has everything to gain and nothing to lose. The provisions for adequate corporate reporting, the provisions by which credit controls will tend to make securities sell on an investment basis, and the provisions outlawing market manipulations give him the materials for a stable investment policy based on stable investment values which he has always sought. In the House committee the other day I heard general agreement that the New England securities market was the best and perhaps the only true investment market in the country—that securities were bought in New England for investment holding and not for speculative trading to a degree unequaled in any other section of the country. Not a little of that sort of investment demand comes from its carefully conservative banks, and from its magnificently operated insurance companies, which safeguard the humble estates men endeavor to create by real self-sacrifice. A bill that tends to stabilize securities markets for such insurance companies, banks, and other investors, that gives them adequate corporation reports on which to base their judgments to buy and sell—that gives them assurances that the values reflected in these corporate reports will not be unpredicably upset by alternate booms and panics in the stock market—is a bill which will put at a premium the qualities on which New England's financial life is based. New England has less reason to be afraid of this bill than has any other section of the country.

The talk about the effect of this proposed legislation upon business usually starts with the statement that it is only right and proper to regulate the abuses on the stock exchanges, but that this legislation goes far beyond the stock exchanges and that under the guise of stock-exchange regulation it reaches out and affects industry of all kinds, both the large and small. It is interesting to know that this talk first came from the representatives of the great stock exchanges, who took it upon themselves, in the true spirit of benevolent philanthropy, to awaken industry to its great peril. While I have no doubt that this propaganda has caused genuine fear to be entertained by many business men, I am equally certain that when the business men of this country become acquainted with the actual provisions of the law, as distinguished from the stigma placed upon it by Wall Street lawyers and public-relations counsel, theirs will be a greatly changed opinion. Wall Street has done more to regiment and monopolize business than this bill could ever hope to.

It is the small industries of New England that carry on the best traditions of American business. It is these industries that sustain themselves by an economy of low-cost production and in the quality of their service, and not by monopoly based on banking control. If this legislation had any tendency to interfere with the self-reliant small industries I should be the first to oppose it and the last to accept it. The curb that this legislation puts upon the excessive flow of credit into the stock market will, in my judgment, be a great boon to these small industries. It will guarantee them adequate credit facilities when business is fully revived, because it will prevent money flowing from local banks into a vortex of speculation in a few metropolitan centers.

The small New England business man should note that under section 4 of the bill it is contemplated that the very small exchanges on which the securities of small, closely held New England corporations are often traded may, as exchanges, be exempted by the administrative commission from all or any of the provisions of the bill. The small business man should also note how carefully the bill, which is fundamentaly only concerned with the trading on the exchanges in the shares of companies which have a sufficiently wide distribution to be traded in on such exchanges and made the subject of abuses incident to such trading, provides that the administrative commission may exempt securities, the markets of which are predominantly intrastate in character. Because of the tremendous difference in circumstances, it was not possible to draw definite lines of classification with which to exclude small corporations. But it should be noted that even a listed security of a small corporation which fits the classification given could probably be exempted by the Commission from all or a large part of the bill, and securities not listed would not be within the scope of the bill at all, except for the purposes of the over-the-counter market section in section 14. The sections of which industry has been told it should be afraid are sections 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15.

The provisions of sections 11 and 12 have been so much discussed on the floor already that I shall not repeat the arguments made by the chairman and Mr. MAPES to show that they are in substance merely a standardization of minimum listing requirements on exchanges, analogous to requirements already made by exchanges and actually less burdensome to issuing corporations than the power now exercised by the New York Stock Exchange.

There have been attempts to make it appear that the control given to the Commission in this section 14 to regulate the over-the-counter markets is really aimed at small industry. Nothing could be further from the truth. The provision for the control of brokers and dealers in the over-the-counter market is not intended as a catch-all by which the Commission can dominate the affairs of unlisted companies. It is simply an absolutely necessary protection for the market on the exchanges which the bill seeks so much to improve. The necessity for that protection has been very clearly put in the report of the Twentieth Century Fund on "Stock-Market Control":

> The benefits that would accrue as the result of raising the standards of security exchanges might be nullified if the over-the-counter markets were left unregulated and uncontrolled. They are of vast proportions, and they would serve as a refuge for any business that might seek to escape the discipline of the exchanges; and the more exacting that discipline, the greater the temptation to escape from it. Over-the-counter markets offer facilities that are useful under certain conditions, but they should not be permitted to expand beyond their proper sphere and compete with the exchanges for business that, from the point of view of public interest, should be confined to the organized markets. This constitutes the sanction for Federal regulation of over-the-counter dealers and brokers. To leave the over-the-counter markets out of a regulatory system would be to destroy the effects of regulating the organized exchanges.

If one wants to put effective restraints upon excessive speculation on the exchanges, it is obviously necessary to guard against the same sort of excessive speculation on the unregulated markets. But those who tell you that the over-the-counter provisions of the bill will interfere directly or indirectly with the small industrial concern are either willfully misleading you or are ignorant of what the bill really does. The control of the Commission with respect to the over-the-counter markets may be exercised only over dealers or brokers who maintain a public market. The Commission has no power to cause any corporation to file any statement or to subject itself in any way to regulation. Even the dealer or broker is not subject to control if he does no more than to try to find a buyer for a person who wants to sell some shares or to find a seller for a person who wants to buy some shares. A dealer or broker creates or maintains an over-the-counter market as it is defined in the bill only if he stands ready both to buy and sell; that is, if he stands ready to quote you a price at which he will buy your shares as well as a price at which he will sell your shares.

Now, if a corporation is small, and has only a few stockholders, it has no concern to see its shares constantly traded in. If the corporation is of such a size that its stockholders demand a public market, then it should be ready to file the very reasonable information for its stockholders that is required of companies whose shares are registered. But even in the case of a large corporation there is no mandatory requirement in the bill that the corporation register its shares on an exchange or meet any requirement that the Commission may impose as a condition to permitting a broker or dealer to create or maintain a public market for its shares. And it is important to note that the over-the-counter provisions of the bill are so framed that the Commission may, but need not, require the filing of information by a corporation as a condition to permitting a dealer or broker to create or maintain a public market for its securities. The over-the-counter markets present so many variants that the bill wisely gives the Commission the broadest discretion, because it is impossible to foresee at the moment whether considerable regulation may be required if the threatened delisting by large publicly owned corporations should occur—which I for one do not anticipate. Certainly the corporation, large or small, with less than 100 security holders, would remain for all practical purposes unaffected by any over-the-counter regulations.

Under this bill a bank may lend any amount it deems proper upon an unlisted security and is not in this respect subject to any margin requirement. Under these circumstances the holder of an unlisted security need not fear being deprived of any legitimate credit facility.

Small, self-reliant industry, such as New England prides itself upon, has nothing to fear and much to gain from such provisions.

Everyone here knows that when you establish a flexible power in a law you are bound to give men power to do harm, but our intention is to give men power to do good, and what reason is there to believe that the power would be abused? Recent history has taught men that those who have had a part in manipulation of the money marts have less of friendship for the folks and no greater love of their country than those now engaged in management of governmental affairs.

This bill is primarily designed to prevent a manipulation of securities—the kind of manipulation that threatened the lives of the insurance companies of America, and thereby the humble estates men endeavored to create by the sweat of the brow and real self-sacrifice. It would remove a chance at manipulation that not only threatened the banking system of the country but actually left many banks broken wreckage upon the rocks. It would forever forbid a manipulation that boiled a market to the point where it attracted credit away from the proper channels of industry into the uncertain paths of speculation.

While there were other contributing causes, none seems to deny that stock gambling, with its now known abuses, ruined many an industry and crippled or destroyed business establishments and working people.

Many of those who would thwart the aim of this bill, and quite sincerely in most instances, approach the situation with an unconscious selfishness that makes them victims of their own blindness. Among them are the men who are schooled in that class which believes in business monopoly. They would maintain a monarchy of business and sit upon its throne. I believe in a far-reaching democracy of business, and I would make more rigid the antitrust laws when the uncertainties of this depression permits that change. They believe in a cash-and-carry plan, and I am sufficiently old-fashioned to still have a regard for those little storekeepers who carried the burden of the neighbors in other dark days—those men who gave the groceries to the neighbor's youngster when he brought no more evidence of money to the store than a badly worn little brown book with a picture of a meat rack and a butcher on the cover.

Manipulation and misleading statements to be hereafter forbidden by law did not stop after crippling banks, insurance companies, industry, and investors.

It dulled the faith of conservative investors in the investment banking houses long engaged in the business of selling high-grade securities. Though the operators of these establishments kept their hands unsoiled they were smeared by the splashing in the muddy waters, and people in business, as well as those out of work, became afraid.

It cannot be that we have staggered through the wilderness for 4 years without having learned the need for the revision of the system. As we try to revive business by experiment it is our sacred responsibility to provide against a reoccurrence of what has happened in our generation.

Those who are loudest in their condemnation of this bill are those who look with scorn upon such social reforms and economic necessities as regulated working hours and old-age pensions. Their influence has been so effective up to now that they could build an opposition to legislation by people who would benefit from it.

Time will undoubtedly find flaws in this particular bill, as it almost always does, because the men of the committee which wrote the bill possess the customary frailties of human nature and finite minds.

This bill does no more than insist upon the truth, and it denies an opportunity to one class of investors that has heretofore been denied to others—or rather it gives the man on the outside a knowledge up to now reserved to himself by the man on the inside.

President Wilson, in 1919, recommended the enactment of a law to prevent the fraudulent methods of promoters by which our people are annually fleeced of many millions of hard-earned money. Prior to that time, or in 1907, President Roosevelt admonished the Congress that the Federal Government should supervise the issuance of securities of any combination doing an interstate business. We now have a President who observed greater abuses in this field than his illustrious predecessors had known, and he insisted that the law be written. His insistence is not my special reason for supporting this measure, for I have strayed from the administrative path when my convictions were in serious conflict with those of our great national leadership. I feebly helped lead the fight against the so-called "municipal bankruptcy bill" in the last session, and I could not bring myself to the conclusion of those who saw wisdom in the recent decision of this House on the tariff proposal. My mind fails to justify the silver opinion we expressed in this body, and I cannot enter the class of those men who yielded to the inflationary temptation of the much-discussed and widely advertised plan to make good for every bank loss of the panic period.

All of this is to emphasize that I am inspired by no socialistic notion or romantic dream. I regard myself as a liberal conservative. This is a conservative bill.

I urge you to pass it in its present form. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 9323, had come to no resolution thereon.

VETO MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—MINIMUM PAY FOR POSTAL SUBSTITUTES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H.R. 7483, entitled "An act to provide minimum pay for postal substitutes." The bill is contrary to public policy in that it provides compensation to a certain class of employees regardless of the need for their services. It is discriminatory and establishes a precedent which, if followed, would undoubtedly lead to many abuses.

As a result of the depression, the postal business decreased to such an extent that the Department had no need for the services of thousands of its employees. By orderly processes, this surplus is being reduced without injustice to the personnel. During the period of declining business and with a surplus of regular employees, the Post Office Department had little or no need for the services of the substitutes, who are carried on the rolls for replacement purposes and to augment the regular forces in emergencies. However, at this time, the postal revenues are increasing and more work is being provided for the substitutes. Therefore, from a humanitarian standpoint, there appears to be no need for legislation of this character.

Aside from any consideration of conditions in the Postal Service with respect to its personnel, this appears to be a relief measure for a particular class of our citizens, and as such is clearly discriminatory.

This bill prohibits the Postmaster General from determining the needs of the Postal Service as to personnel in that it requires the Post Office Department to retain on its rolls all substitutes of record at this time. It fixes definitely the maximum number of substitutes that may be carried in certain groups, regardless of conditions, and is therefore not in the interest of good administration of the public business.

There is attached the Postmaster General's statement which sets forth in detail the objections to this bill.

My disapproval of this measure is not based on the consideration of the additional expenditures it would require but on the deeper consideration of public policy. I trust that the Congress will continue to cooperate with me in our common effort to establish and follow policies that will be best for all of our people.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 30, 1934.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill and the message be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN (H.DOC. NO. 337)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in Executive Departments and ordered printed:

To the Congress:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 16 of the act of March 3, 1933 (ch. 212, 47 Stat. 1517), as amended by title III of the act of March 20, 1933 (ch. 3, 48 Stat. 16), I am transmitting herewith an Executive order providing for the abolishment of the Office of the Alien Property Custodian and the transfer of its functions to the Department of Justice.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE FRAZIER-LEMKE BILL

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a short address delivered over the radio on the Frazier-Lemke bill by my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MUSSELWHITE].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address by my colleague from Michigan [Mr. MUSSELWHITE] broadcast on the Frazier-Lemke bill, which is occupying the attention of farmers throughout the State of Michigan and the entire country.

The address is as follows:

My friends, I am happy to have this opportunity to address you briefly in support of the Frazier-Lemke bill for the relief of the beleaguered farmers of the Nation.

With other Members of the Congress I have signed the petition for discharge of the committee and presentation of the measure on the floor of the House. I am aware that violent opposition has been expressed against it by interests which have too long dominated the financial policies of this Government.

Farm-born myself, and representing an agricultural district, my interests have always been and still are with the Nation's producers. Throughout my whole lifetime I have seen them discriminated against in legislation. I am not a professional viewer-with-alarm. Far from it.

The achievements of this administration in its recovery program constitute a prideful chapter in American history. From the viewpoints of industry, finance, and general business our country is immeasurably better off than it was in March 1933, when the lowest depths of national and individual insolvency, misery, and despair were plumbed.

But what has been done for the farmer, most oppressed of all our citizenry? Oh, he has shared to some extent in the general recovery, but not proportionately to other classes. But, like the good soldier he is, he has stood by, hoping, praying, and toiling along, waiting for something to be done in his behalf.

To my mind, the Frazier-Lemke bill is the answer to his prayer. Lift the heavy yoke of mortgage and high-interest payments from the neck of the farmer and you will be amazed at the response, at the quickening of all business. Recovery should begin at the roots of production, not at its top branches. And the farm is the genesis of all productivity.

Relief of this distressing farm situation—actual, not theoretical relief—is the purpose of the Frazier-Lemke bill. I will not bore you with a long string of statistics. Others may if they wish. Tables of figures are as annoying to me as to anyone.

I assume that you have read the Frazier-Lemke bill and are familiar with its provisions. To summarize:

It provides that the United States Government shall refinance existing farm indebtedness at 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent principal on the amortization plan, not by issuance of bonds but by issuing Federal Reserve notes secured by first mortgages on farm lands. Could anything be fairer? There is no better security. I am credibly informed that if the Government will do this it will make a profit of better than $6,000,000,000 at 1½-percent interest in 47 years, the time required for amortization of the farm indebtedness.

It appears to me that this would be good business.

And under this provision the farmers of the Nation would have to pay $6,149,500,000 less interest in 47 years, while the Government makes its profit of upward of $6,000,000,000 and lessens the Federal tax burden in an equal amount.

Can you find any fault with that?

Under the present Farm Mortgage Act the farmer has to pay 4½-percent interest if he lives in a Federal Farm Loan Association district and 5 percent if he does not, and pay in addition 1 percent for administration, and on top of this buy stock in an amount equal to 5 percent of his loan, making 10½ or 11 percent for the first year and thereafter 4½ or 5 percent with 1 percent for amortization, making 5½ or 6 percent annually until paid. The high rate of interest is like a little Old Man of the Sea upon his shoulders. It is impossible to shake it off. The Frazier-Lemke bill takes into consideration the farmer's ability to pay.

I asked a moment ago who could find fault with this. I will answer my own question now. The beneficiaries of the system of issuing tax-exempt bonds bearing interest at 3½ percent, the money kings of Wall and Broad Streets, the international bankers who control the big fortunes of the country can and do object strenuously and piteously. And these moguls of high finance, the Morgans and the Kuhn-Loebs, and until recently the Insulls, through peculiar provisions of our present financial structure, finance their operations with money furnished them by the Government itself through the medium of a revolving fund, the ostensible aim of which is to maintain the national credit, on which all money value is based.

Abler speakers than I am will enlighten you further on this head. Issuance of Federal Reserve notes to take care of this situation would be classed by alarmists as "inflation", dread word in the sacrosanct circles of plutocracy. "Inflation" is a bogeyman held up whenever the security of the overprivileged is threatened as a scarecrow to drive out trespassers in the field of privilege.

What is money, anyway? It isn't gold in the raw, nor silver, nor currency, nor any other medium of exchange unless it is backed by the credit of the nation whose name it carries as the guaranty of its integrity. Federal Reserve notes bearing the endorsement of the United States are as much money as gold or silver or any other circulating medium. And they are as sound, as solid, as secure as Government bonds backed by the same surety as tax-exempt bonds, the rich man's resort from paying his just obligations to the government which extends him the privileges he enjoys.

Under the beneficient workings of the new deal industry, finance, and business have benefited vastly. The legislative pulmotor has revived and, to a large extent, restored them. But for the farmers, what? Disappointment and disillusionment. We are at the crossroads. The Frazier-Lemke bill points the way to a better, brighter day.

It is sound. It is sane. It has my support, unreservedly. Prosperity for the farmer spells prosperity for the Nation.

I thank you for your attention.

CONTINUANCE OF THE C.W.A.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD with reference to continuance of the C.W.A.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Speaker, during the past week I have had the opportunity of investigating the conditions under which a great percentage of the laboring and white-collared men of my district are living, and frankly I marvel at the extreme patience which they have shown in the face of the months of unemployment they have undergone.

I have taken occasion twice on the floor of this House to call your attention to the necessity of providing at all costs adequate means whereby the unemployed men and women of this country may have an opportunity to earn the necessities of life.

I have urgently requested that we continue the C.W.A. under a program that would provide for a considerably larger number of men than before. Instead of heeding that suggestion, the C.W.A. was discontinued entirely and the Relief Works Division was set up in its stead, necessitating the reduction of working personnel more than 50 percent. This, of course, placed a much greater burden on the relief organizations. Under the R.W.D. great difficulty was experienced, in my district at least, in securing money with which to meet the pay roll. In fact, when the order was issued last week to discontinue all work in the county of Lawrence, Pa., they lacked $4,700 of having sufficient funds with which to pay the men for work they had done.

On yesterday the Governor of my State flew to Washington to insist that more relief be given that great Commonwealth. I appreciate very much the fight he is waging in behalf of the unemployed, and I have endeavored to help him by going personally before the relief agency and giving first-hand information of conditions in my district. I sincerely hope that out of these conferences may soon come the much-needed help to my people.

It was my privilege to attend a meeting of representatives of the 12,000 men who were registered for employment in that county last Friday night. Despite the fact that I have endeavored to keep in touch with the relief situation, I was doubly impressed with the earnestness and determination of those men who have organized for the purpose of bringing their plight before you, in the hope that you will realize their situation and take the necessary steps to enable them to carry on as Americans should.

It seems the administration has determined to retract from its original principles of providing work for the unemployed and needy and return to the former system of relief orders. Gentlemen, the unemployed men of this country will no longer accept such treatment willingly. To adopt such a policy is inviting serious trouble. I cannot believe there is a Member of this House whose sympathies are not with the great body of men and women, who for months, yes, years, have been unable to earn their daily bread. We have responded each time our President has asked for the appropriation of millions to be loaned to business corporations in the hope that it would start up the wheels of industry and make it possible for workers to take up their labors where they left off months ago. I do not deny that we have accomplished something, but we still have millions of workers unemployed, and the prospects for their employment by industry at an early date are not bright.

I have placed in the hands of each member of the Pennsylvania delegation in this House and each of the Senators from Pennsylvania a copy of the following resolution, adopted by representatives of the 12,000 unemployed workers of Lawrence County. My colleagues, this is not a partisan matter; neither is it a local situation. It represents the plight of millions of unemployed men throughout the Nation. If the tone of the resolution sounds radical, it should be remembered it comes from the lips of men who are desperate. Many of them have worn the uniform of their country in time of war; most of them are responsible for the welfare and comfort of wives and babies. Place yourself in their position. They have suffered physically and mentally. They have displayed the utmost patience and courage. They are petitioning us, as citizens of the United States, under their rights as such. It is our duty to heed them and find a remedy for their troubles.

We have been advised by administration leaders at various times during this Congress that we were fighting an emergency equal to that of 1917 and 1918. No Member of this House has disputed that statement. I believe the present emergency is even worse than that. So long as there remains either Federal or private resources in this country we are derelict in our duty as Representatives if we permit the continuation of such deplorable conditions among our people. I, for one, am ready to go the limit in this matter, even to the extent of drafting private resources to bring about recovery.

I am convinced the laboring and middle classes of this great Nation have about reached the end of their patience, they demand immediate relief. Let us not invite trouble by forcing them to take matters in their own hand. Let us preserve America by protecting Americans from hunger and want. I am pleased to present the following petition and urge every Member of this House to give it serious consideration; consider the plight of the men who present it. It represents the true state of affairs. There can be no justification for hunger and misery in a land of plenty. Let us act with a determination that will prevent internal strife. If we do not try, we have failed to do our duty and should be replaced by men who will.

We the Cooperative Workers of America, Lawrence County Unit of Pennsylvania, are compelled to call your attention to our resolution of April 10, 1934, pertaining to the failure of the R.W.D. to properly function to meet our needs. The answer to that resolution has been to entirely suspend all R.W.D. operations in the State of Pennsylvania.

A comparison of facts and figures tends to show a brazen discrimination against this Commonwealth, and we must have some action to correct this condition at once. We note the State of Pennsylvania in 1933 paid 7.37 percent of all Federal taxes and received in return only 4.61 percent of emergency aid, while our neighbor State of Ohio, with like industrial conditions, paid 4.69 percent and received 7.70 percent of emergency aid. Do you attribute this condition to the difference in political affiliations of our elected national and State representatives? Don't you think it is highly important for our national security that our statesmen should cease using the welfare of millions of our citizens as a sacrifice on the altar of political greed?

Our humiliation and fear for the future compel us to make the following resolution:

Resolved, We, 12,000 R.W.D. and unemployed workers, do now most emphatically protest the shutting down of all R.W.D. projects and demand that immediate action be taken to provide work at living wages for all able-bodied workers and full and adequate relief for all families who are unable to work, until industry is willing or compelled to absorb them. The time of playing politics with human misery must end or disastrous results will follow.

THE COOPERATIVE WORKERS OF AMERICA,
JESSE C. DUFFORD, President.
DOYLE GLOSNER, Secretary,
New Castle, Pa.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert a short statement made by Dr. William A. Taylor, Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry of the Department of Agriculture, before the Committee on Appropriations relative to the advisability of transferring the Botanic Garden to the Department of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I am heartily in favor of granting the relief sought by Hon. George W. Hess, who for many years has been the able, efficient, courteous, and most valuable director of the Botanic Garden. He certainly deserves this little recognition at the hands of Congress. He has grown old in this service, and faithful, hard work for the Government has helped to impair his health.

Under the vigilant care and expert training of George W. Hess, I have watched this small Government institution grow abundantly from the small plant it once was to the magnificent Botanic Garden that it now is, than which there is none to be found more beautiful.

But I am not in favor of transferring this project to the Department of Agriculture. I want it kept under separate management. There is now very little, if any, duplication of overhead. And I firmly believe that any money saved would be at the expense of the value of the Botanic Garden.

CIRCULATION OF READING MATTER AMONG THE BLIND

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 2922) to amend the act entitled "An act to promote the circulation of reading matter among the blind", approved April 27, 1904, and acts supplemental thereto, and pass the same, a similar House bill being on the calendar.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this agreeable to the minority members of the committee?

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this bill was acted upon and reported by the House committee unanimously and is favored by the Department. The measure also passed the Senate unanimously, and I am simply substituting the Senate bill for the House bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to promote the circulation of reading matter among the blind", approved April 27, 1904 (33 Stat. 313), the supplemental provision in section 1 of the Post Office Appropriation Act for 1913, approved August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. 551), and the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to provide for the free transmission through the mails of certain publications for the blind", approved June 7, 1924 (43 Stat. 668; U.S.C., title 39, ch. 8, sec. 331), be, and the same are hereby, amended to read as follows:

"Books, pamphlets, and other reading matter published either in raised characters, whether prepared by hand or printed, or in the form of sound-reproduction records for the use of the blind, in packages not exceeding 12 pounds in weight, and containing no advertising or other matter whatever, unsealed, and when sent by public institutions for the blind, or by any public libraries, as a loan to blind readers, or when returned by the latter to such institutions or public libraries; magazines, periodicals, and other regularly issued publications in such raised characters, whether prepared by hand or printed, or on sound-reproduction records (for the use of the blind), which contain no advertisements and for which no subscription fee is charged, shall be transmitted in the United States mails free of postage and under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

"Volumes of the Holy Scriptures, or any part thereof, published either in raised characters, whether prepared by hand or printed, or in the form of sound reproduction records for the use of the blind, which do not contain advertisements (a) when furnished by an organization, institution, or association not conducted for private profit, to a blind person without charge, shall be transmitted in the United States mails free of postage; (b) when furnished by an organization, institution, or association not conducted for private profit to a blind person at a price not greater than the cost price thereof, shall be transmitted in the United States mails at the postage rate of 1 cent for each pound or fraction thereof; under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

"All letters written in point print or raised characters or on sound reproduction records used by the blind, when unsealed, shall be transmitted through the mails as third-class matter."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

SETTLEMENT OF THE RAILROAD CONTROVERSY

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and point out the significance of the settlement of the railroad controversy and include therein a brief memorandum of agreement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, the country at large may not fully realize the important significance of the settlement of the railroad controversy. To realize the serious side of the question requires a knowledge of the problems involved, the attitude of the railroad executives, and the position taken by the administration.

The conflict which has been raging for months concerned the wages of employees employed on the railroads of the United States. The attitude taken by the railroad executives was in direct conflict with the position assumed by the representatives of labor. The railroads contended for a further reduction in the wage scale of the workers, while the railroad labor chiefs demanded the restoration of the pay cut which became effective in 1930.

The President of the United States and Joseph B. Eastman, the Coordinator of the Railroads, put forth every effort to bring about a settlement of the perplexing question. After a number of conferences, the President took a determined stand in support of a speedy and peaceful settlement of the controversy. He offered as a suggestion to be considered in connection with the settlement several important proposals:

First. The scaling down of the topheavy indebtedness of the railroads.

Second. An increase in employment opportunities for those who have been working part time or who have been furloughed by the railroads.

Third. The postponement for a period of 6 months of the wage question, during which time the roads were to improve their financial position and spread employment among the workers.

It was further recommended through the Coordinator of the Railroads, Joseph B. Eastman, that a conference between the railroad executives and the executives of the standard labor organizations be called at once to arrange for an equitable settlement of the controversy. Under these circumstances, with the railroad executives contending for a continuation of the wage cuts for a further 6 months' period, and emphasizing the President's attitude on that one particular question, they met in a round-table conference with the representatives of railroad labor and effected a settlement which meets with the approval of the President and the country.

It is another illustration of the matchless statesmanship of the representatives of the standard railroad labor organizations. It is likewise another illustration of the great need for bona fide unions that are truly representative of the employees. The settlement effected at the round-table conference between representatives of employee and employer in this instance proved to be a victory for the workers, who realize that the end of the wage cut is in sight. It strengthens the contention of the real friends of the National Recovery Act who have come to realize that only with strong independent unions is it possible to keep consuming power on a fair parity with productive capacity.

The genius of our day has solved the problem of mass production, but the influence and effectiveness of the labor organizations are necessary to solve the problem of mass distribution. The representatives of labor in this instance made a mighty contribution toward the solution of our present-day problems, for it not only presented the viewpoint of the worker and his demands, but it likewise presented a criticism of the financial structure of the railroads as effectively as a congressional investigation could have accomplished. The work of the N.R.A. would be simplified if that administration enjoyed the cooperation and support of free voluntary labor unions.

MEMORANDUM OF AGREEMENT

This agreement, entered into at Washington, D.C., between the undersigned Conference Committee of Managers and the Railway Labor Executives Association, witnesses that the parties have agreed as follows:

1. As hereinafter modified the agreement signed at Chicago, Ill., on January 31, 1932, as extended by agreements dated December 21, 1932, and June 21, 1933, in behalf of participating railroads and their employees, represented as therein set forth, and who are further represented in the making of this agreement by the respective parties hereto, is hereby extended as hereinafter set forth and upon the terms and conditions hereinafter stated.

2. Basic rates of pay, until changed upon notice as hereinafter provided, shall remain as under the agreement of January 31, 1932, as extended. Seven and one half percent shall be deducted from the pay check of each of the employees covered by this agreement for the period beginning on July 1, 1934, and ending on December 31, 1934, inclusive, and said deduction shall be reduced to 5 percent for the period beginning on January 1, 1935, and ending on March 31, 1935, inclusive, and no further deduction shall be made under this agreement thereafter.

3. No notices of changes in basic rates shall be served by any party upon any other party prior to May 1, 1935.

4. With respect to employees in the lower-paid brackets, the foregoing shall not be taken to prevent discussion and adjustment between individual carriers and organizations with respect to spreading employment, or of the matter of opportunity for increased earnings of part-time employees, but changes in basic rates shall in no event be involved.

5. If, as, and when, on or after May 1, 1935, notices of changes in basic rates shall be served by any of the organizations or carriers now represented by the Railway Labor Executives Association and the Conference Committee of Managers, it is understood that said association and said committee cannot bind any such organization or any such carrier in respect thereto, but they do recommend that in the event that general wage movements are inaugurated, the proceedings under such notices should be conducted nationally and pursuant to the Railway Labor Act.

6. Formal notices heretofore served by the participating railroads upon the participating organizations of employees for a 15-percent reduction in basic rates of pay shall be considered as withdrawn and further proceedings thereunder discontinued.

This agreement is signed at Washington, D.C., this 26th day of April 1934 in behalf of the participating railroads and their employees represented as hereinbefore set forth, as modified by supplements nos. 1 and 2 to appendix A and supplement no. 1 to appendix B and supplements nos. 1 and 2 to appendix C, said supplements being attached hereto and made a part hereof.

HENRY ELLENBOGEN

Mr. GAVAGAN, from the Committee on Elections No. 2, by direction of that committee, presented a report on the memorial matter of HENRY ELLENBOGEN, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

THE HYDRAULIC EXPERIMENTAL STATION AT VICKSBURG, MISS.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered yesterday by me before the Twenty-ninth Annual Convention of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

The address follows:

While in the lower Mississippi Valley last December I made a special point of inspecting the waterways experimental station at Vicksburg. Officers in the Corps of Engineers have been engaged upon surveys and studies of the Mississippi River since 1820. At that time Congress appropriated funds for a survey of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. Lieutenants Bernard and Totten did the work and in 1822 submitted their report recommending dikes. Again, in 1850, Congress appropriated $50,000 for further surveys, which were performed by Captains Humphreys and Abbott and resulted in their famous Physics and Hydraulics of the Mississippi, which has long remained the most weighty treatise on the problems of the great Father of Waters. We people of Louisiana know that it was during the Presidential administration of Gen. Zachary Taylor, a planter of Louisiana, that the first Federal appropriations were made available for the improvement of the Mississippi.

Even before the War between the States, as well as after that crisis and the hard years following, it was recognized by the engineer officers stationed in our Southern States that the Mississippi River was a national problem too great for local interests to cope with and therefore only to be successfully solved by means of Federal aid. General Humphreys, who became Chief of Engineers after the war, realized this, as did the Army engineers on the first Mississippi River Commission, organized in 1879, and, indeed, ever since. These men have known our problem, have studied it through many floods, always seeking to know more about their task.

I have always been interested in this phase of our national rivers-and-harbors and flood-control work, and as a member of the House Committee on Flood Control I supported the Army engineers' desire to perfect their laboratory experiments down there in close contact with their actual river operations. I recognized the fact that the Mississippi River Commission, with its eminent Army engineer and equally long-experienced civilian membership, have for years been assembling and utilizing the most complete and most reliable fund of river engineering data in the world. The logical place to utilize this vast amount of scientific information in theoretical experiment and actual practice is, of course, right at the job itself. There the engineers in charge have not only at hand their own field assistants who know the Mississippi and its tributaries thoroughly, working in close and friendly cooperation with our levee board engineers, but they also were able to utilize the actual physical elements of river materials under the very climatic conditions which exercise such an important influence upon the work.

When in 1927–28 the Chief of Engineers sent an able group of his officers abroad to study European hydraulic laboratory practice under the direction of the then Col. Edward Murphy Markham, I awaited with keen interest the general's recommendation. It was, as could be expected, sound and logical. He said he wanted to conduct such theoretical experimental work right by the job itself, using the Mississippi's own materials. We gave him the necessary authority under the Flood Control Act of May 15, 1928.

How wise this decision has proven to be I had opportunity to verify this December. I spent an entire day with the district engineer at Vicksburg—first in the offices of the Mississippi River Commission, from which the great flood-control project is directed, then at the Waterways Experimental Station, seeing that splendid installation in efficient operation, and finally out on the old river itself where the experimental work is being further tested in full-sized operations in nature, under the direction of Gen. Harley B. Ferguson, president of the Mississippi River Commission.

Of course, I expected to find a smooth operating and competent headquarters under the Army engineers, who have direct charge of all of this work. Nor did I find it otherwise in spite of the great overload placed upon the division and district offices by the emergency program allotments from the President's recovery funds. The Army engineers seem to have an unlimited capacity for further work—the same cheerful willingness to accept added responsibility which always has characterized their response to our great flood emergencies. This is in accordance with their long training and unfailing record of public service both in peace and in war. I expected that I would find cheerful efficiency despite the overload, and I did. I have, of course, known these officers intimately for many years. With them we fought through the great floods of 1912–13, 1916, 1922, and 1927, as well as many intermediate emergencies during and since that time. It was the great catastrophe of 1927 which, as many of us recall, brought the Nation to a shocking realization of our problem.

The heavy loss of life and property, in spite of all that could be done, made it clear that the Federal Government must assume the cost of controlling its great river. Since the act of May 15, 1928, a great deal has been done, and the results are proving every day to be more than entirely justified. Vast reaches of the richest Delta lands—entire parishes in Louisiana and counties in Mississippi, Arkansas, Tennessee, and Missouri are enjoying more secure protection now than ever before, and their apprehension of the constant danger from recurring flood is greatly allayed. I have followed all of this steadily prosecuted flood-protection work authorized by the Flood Control Act of 1928. It is being accomplished well ahead of schedule as well as within the estimated costs. In practical field engineering I knew what the engineers were doing—and I wanted to know about the theory side.

Out at the Waterways Experimental Station I was indeed pleasantly surprised. It was hardly conceivable to me that so much could have been accomplished within so short a period of time. They have built a fine storage dam and reservoir there in a beautiful valley of a small tributary stream nestled in the Vicksburg hills, a complete laboratory building housing the most highly scientific equipment and have expanded the out-of-doors layout into an amazing development of working models.

Naturally I asked how so much could be achieved—a dozen working models of critical reaches in the Mississippi's tortuous course from St. Louis to its mouth—large models of backwater areas for the Arkansas, the White, the Atchafalaya, the Black, and the Red—tests to determine the effects of the river's scour and bank caving—and of scour in the river bed itself. Nor are the experiments confined to Mississippi River problems. In addition to these many and intricate questions of engineering theory and practice, I found that ideas were being tested for Ohio River locks and dams, for many of our ocean and lake harbors—any practical problem of an associated nature which confronts the Nation's engineer department at large.

The officer in charge of the experimental station is Lieut. Herbert D. Vogel, who received his appointment to West Point from the State of Michigan. Cadet Vogel during his 4 years at West Point proved his outstanding ability and established a splendid record. Out of that strenuous course of natural selection, Lieutenant Vogel was graduated an honor man near the head of his large class. For postgraduate work he was given his M.A. degree by the University of Michigan, then after a tour of field duty he completed the course at the Army Engineer School. After another period of field experience, he went to the University of California where he earned his C.E. degree, followed by a year in Germany where, in 1929, the Berliner Technische Hochachule awarded him the high honor of a doctor's degree in engineering. From this experience he went to the lower Mississippi Valley, and under his immediate and skillful direction has been built and developed the waterways experiment station at Vicksburg.

Now, I do not profess to be sufficiently expert to appreciate all these technical intricacies of engineering science. Nor does a visitor to the Vicksburg plant have to be a technician to grasp the significance of that work.

I asked Lieutenant Vogel to write up for me a summary of his waterways experiment station's results thus far. With characteristic punctuality and frank simplicity he has done so—explaining that he has covered the high spots only, his station having developed more than a hundred model experiments in the past 3 years. The illustrations accompanying his report afford a helpful visualization of the work the Army engineers are doing.

This experimental station at Vicksburg is now ready to render valuable, definite, and scientific service for the control for all purposes of all the waterways within the United States.

Gen. Edward M. Markham, with full knowledge based upon his investigations and studies abroad, testified before the Flood Control Committee on April 25, 1934, that the hydraulic experimental station at Vicksburg has no equal in any nation in the world.

In a comprehensive plan for flood control, improvement for navigation, power development, and land-use policies for all purposes, this station and the engineering force in charge affords an opportunity for a Nation-wide service.

INVESTIGATION OF WAGE AND LABOR CONDITIONS

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, as further evidence of an immediate investigation of wage and labor conditions on Government building jobs in the District of Columbia, I submit for your attention some documents furnished me by Mr. John Locher, executive of the Washington Building Trades Council. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point and include therein some documents setting forth in some detail the situation, and to include two or three affidavits.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, what is that about?

Mr. McFADDEN. The labor situation in the District.

Mr. O'CONNOR. From whom?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. John J. Verleger and James Gaskins.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Are they plumbers or bricklayers?

Mr. McFADDEN. Both, I think.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the first of these documents is a sworn affidavit made by Mr. John J. Verleger, relating to the circumstances of his employment on construction work at Walter Reed Hospital. The affidavit reads as follows:

JULY 24, 1933.

I, the undersigned, do hereby make affidavit as to rates and hours worked on the nurses' home at the Walter Reed Hospital job, Washington, D.C. Also, conditions prevailing among other men.

July: First week, 5, 6, 7; second week, 8, 10, 12, 13; third week, 14, 15, 18, 19, 20.

On each of the above-mentioned dates I worked 7½ hours. The first week I drew $33.75, and returned one half, which amounted to $16.87½, and the second week I drew $45 and returned one half, which amounted to $22.50; the third week I drew $45, but refused to return any money.

I was told when I secured the job that my pay would be 75 cents an hour, but I would receive $1.50 an hour in the presence of the inspector, but would have to come back to the office and turn back to the firm one half of what I drew. This was told to me by Mr. Edward Maas, of the E. A. Maas Plumbing Co., who is the plumbing contractor on the above-mentioned job. I also find that some of the men on this job are working 37½ hours a week.

Morris Hayden, plumber, made 45 hours a week for 1 week to my knowledge. He worked July 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, and 13.

Henry Maas made 45 hours a week, for 1 week to my knowledge. He worked July 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, and 13.

The following men also worked on the job either as plumbers or helpers: William Shylager, Otts Woislager, Al Rhinehart, and a man by the name of Weber.

I understand that specifications say that veterans must be given the preference. The following men are not veterans: William Shylager, Morris Hayden, and Otts Woislager.

JOHN J. VERLEGER.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 24th day of July 1933.

HARRY M. SHOCKETT, Notary Public.

My commission expires May 5, 1935.

This seems to be a very flagrant case of extortion by a contractor, involving a rebate of 50 percent of the wages to the contractor named in the affidavit. This goes beyond any question of violating the Bacon-Davis Act. Apparently a conspiracy existed to deceive the inspector employed by the Government.

Next I offer an affidavit signed by James Gaskin, in which it appears that even the low wages of laborers are not exempt from similar extortion. This affidavit reads as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

James Gaskin, being first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is 26 years of age, and that he resides at 746 Lamont Street NW., in the city of Washington, D.C., and that his legal residence is 119 Lincoln Street, Hampton, Va.

Affiant further deposing says that he is a laborer, and as such was employed by the Blue Ridge Tile Co., subcontractors for the A. Lloyd Goode Construction Co., general contractors for the erection of the Paul Junior High School, located in the vicinity of Eighth and Peabody Streets NW., in the city of Washington, D.C.

Affiant further deposing says that he began work on, to wit, February 16, 1932, and is still employed on said job; that your affiant receives the sum of 40 cents per hour for an 8-hour day, but that after your affiant signs the pay roll for the said 40 cents per hour, the sum of 10 cents per hour is immediately deducted, and which sum your affiant is informed is returned to the general contractor.

Affiant further deposing says that this affidavit is made of his own free will and accord, without remuneration, and that all of the facts contained herein are true to the best of his knowledge and belief.

JAMES GASKIN.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 1st day of April 1932.

HARRY S. GOLDSTEIN,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

For the third piece of evidence I offer a copy of a telegram received at Durham, N.C., by Mr. B. L. Hershberger, as follows:

[Western Union telegram]

ASHEVILLE, N.C., February 19, 1932.

B. L. HERSHBERGER,
Care Western Union, Durham, N.C.:

Your telegram received. Have wired our superintendent, M. R. Michie, Paul Junior High School Building, Eighth and Peabody Streets, Washington, D.C., that you and Boswell will report to him on above-mentioned school building; wages per our agreement.

BLUE RIDGE TILE CO.

This telegram is an order for the recipient to report for work on a job in Washington, D.C. This is a clear case of importing labor into the District of Columbia. Let us see what happened to Mr. Hershberger on this job and what his agreement with Blue Ridge Tile Co. was.

I quote next an affidavit by Mr. Hershberger a few weeks after the date of the telegram. This affidavit reads:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, SS:

B. L. Hershberger, being first duly sworn according to law, on oath deposes and says that he is 28 years of age; that he resides at 209 E Street NW., in the city of Washington, D.C., and that his legal residence is Durham, N.C.

Affiant further deposing says that he is a tile setter by trade, and as such was employed by the Blue Ridge Tile Co., subcontractors for the A. Lloyd Goode Construction Co., general contractors, for the erection of the Paul Junior High School, located in the vicinity of Eighth and Peabody Streets NW., in the city of Washington, D.C.

Your affiant further deposing says that he began work on, to-wit, February 22, 1932, and was laid off on March 31, 1932, and that your affiant received the sum of $1.50 per hour for an 8-hour day, but that your affiant, after signing the pay roll for the $1.50 rate per hour, was requested to return to the foreman 50 cents per hour, and which sum of money your affiant was informed was returned to the general contractor.

Your affiant further deposing says that at the beginning of the work your affiant was told by the foreman that he would collect the little change, meaning the 50 cents per hour, on Monday and that the return held good for every mechanic on the job. That your affiant did make the return of the 50 cents per hour to his foreman every Monday morning following pay day, and that your affiant was under the impression that if the same was not made he would be immediately laid off.

Affiant further deposing says that this affidavit is made of his own free will and accord, without remuneration, and that all of the facts contained herein are true to the best of his knowledge and belief.

B. L. HERSHBERGER.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 1st day of April 1932.

HARRY S. GOLDSTEIN,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

These exhibits are selected from scores of similar documents in the possession of Mr. Locher. I am told that other men in Washington hold similar documents and that they are all anxious to lay their evidence before a properly authorized committee of this House.

Mr. Speaker, an unspeakable situation exists. Every day that it is allowed to continue will add to the justified discontent and distrust of working people throughout the country. I hope that the Rules Committee will take prompt action to report out for passage either my resolution calling for an investigation of these conditions or some other resolution to similar effect.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes, to comment upon a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I rise at this time to offer evidence of the sincerity and soundness of the advocates of bank depositors' pay-off legislation by calling the attention of the House to a State supreme court decision which was handed down yesterday in the State of Mississippi.

JACKSON, MISS., April 30.—The Mississippi Supreme Court held today that the St. Louis Federal Reserve Bank, if pleadings in a case were true, had shown fraud, in inducing the depositors of the First National Bank of Corinth to continue to do business with the bank when the Reserve institution knew it was insolvent.

The court's statement handed down in a divided 3-to-2 decision was made in reversing the case of the Reserve bank against B. C. Dilworth and others in connection with the collection of a note. A lower court had decided in favor of the bank.

The decision said it was alleged that while the First National Bank was insolvent and indebted to the Reserve bank, depositors started a run on it and the Reserve bank, knowing its condition, represented to the public that the bank was solvent, that the Reserve bank was behind the Corinth bank and that it reopened with depositors showing renewed confidence.

It was further alleged that the Federal Reserve bank then got all the securities of the First National to further secure its debts.

"The facts as pleaded show strongly fraud on the part of the Federal Reserve bank", the decision said.

Dilworth claimed he had an agreement with the First National Bank to apply any balance he might have when his note became due, against his indebtedness and that he had a substantial balance when the bank closed.

The court's decision said the pleadings showed Dilworth continued to do business at the bank not knowing it was insolvent.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. Did that case go up on demurrer?

Mr. McLEOD. I do not know.

Mr. BYRNS. I infer that it is purely a decision on a demurrer filed with pleadings, and if so it does not settle anything. In other words, it was not a trial on its merits.

Mr. McLEOD. The Associated Press report did not show how the case got to the supreme court.

Mr. BYRNS. I take it from the decision itself which the gentleman has just read, the case was heard on a demurrer as to the sufficiency of the pleading in the lower court and not on the merits of the proposition, so that it does not decide anything as to the real liability of the bank or its action.

Mr. McLEOD. This might clear up the gentleman's question:

The court's statement handed in a divided 3-to-2 decision was made in reversing the case of the Reserve bank against B. C. Dilworth and others.

Mr. BYRNS. That may be true, but the lower court may have sustained the demurrer, and then an appeal was taken, and the supreme court, if I gather the decision correctly, held that the lower court was incorrect in sustaining the demurrer, and that the case should go to trial upon the merits, and the facts developed, so that I do not think the opinion which the gentleman has just read decided anything with reference to the liability or nonliability of the bank.

Mr. McLEOD. I will answer the gentleman by quoting the language of the court as it appears in the Associated Press report:

The facts as pleaded show strongly fraud on the part of the Reserve bank.

Mr. BYRNS. Those are the facts set up in the petition or the declaration or whatever it may be called in the State of Mississippi, but that is the statement of the complainant, and as the gentleman well knows a demurrer admits, for the sake of argument, the truth of the allegations contained in the bill, and the court was simply passing on the facts stated in the bill as being true, for the sake of argument, but does not determine anything as to the liability of the bank.

Mr. McLEOD. It says that these were the facts as established in reversing the lower court.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DICKSTEIN, for the balance of the week, on account of death in his family.

To Mr. KRAMER, at the request of Mr. BYRNS, for the balance of the week, on account of official business.

To Mr. BURCH, for today, on account of important business.

"(a) Privilege to file consolidated returns.—An affiliated group of corporations shall, subject to the provisions of this section, have the privilege of making a consolidated return for the taxable year in lieu of separate returns. The making of a consolidated return shall be upon the condition that all the corporations which have been members of the affiliated group at any time during the taxable year for which the return is made consent to all the regulations under subsection (b) (or, in case of such regulations are not prescribed prior to the making of the return, then the regulations prescribed under section 141 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1932 insofar as not inconsistent with this act) prescribed prior to the making of such return; and the making of a consolidated return shall be considered as such consent. In the case of a corporation which is a member of the affiliated group for a fractional part of the year the consolidated return shall include the income of such corporation for such part of the year as it is a member of the affiliated group.

"(b) Regulations.—The Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe such regulations as he may deem necessary in order that the tax liability of any affiliated group of corporations making a consolidated return and of each corporation in the group, both during and after the period of affiliation, may be determined, computed, assessed, collected, and adjusted in such manner as clearly to reflect the income and to prevent avoidance of tax liability.

"(c) Computation and payment of tax.—In any case in which a consolidated return is made the tax shall be determined, computed, assessed, collected, and adjusted in accordance with the regulations under subsection (b) (or, in case such regulations are not prescribed prior to the making of the return, then the regulations prescribed under section 141 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1932 insofar as not inconsistent with this act) prescribed prior to the date on which such return is made; except that there shall be added to the rate of tax prescribed by section 13 (a) a rate of 2 percent, but the tax at such increased rate shall be considered as imposed by section 13 (a).

"(d) Definition of 'affiliated group.'—As used in this section an 'affiliated group' means one or more chains of corporations connected through stock ownership with a common parent corporation if—

"(1) At least 95 percent of the stock of each of the corporations (except the common parent corporation) is owned directly by one or more of the other corporations; and

"(2) The common parent corporation owns directly at least 95 percent of the stock of at least one of the other corporations; and

"(3) Each of the corporations is either (A) a corporation whose principal business is that of a common carrier by railroad or (B) a corporation, the assets of which consist principally of stock in such corporations and which does not itself operate a business other than that of a common carrier by railroad. For the purpose of determining whether the principal business of a corporation is that of a common carrier by railroad, if a common carrier by railroad has leased its railroad properties and such properties are operated as such by another common carrier by railroad, the business of receiving rents for such railroad properties shall be considered as the business of a common carrier by railroad.

"As used in this subsection (except in paragraph (3)) the term 'stock' does not include nonvoting stock which is limited and preferred as to dividends.

"(e) Foreign corporations: A foreign corporation shall not be deemed to be affiliated with any other corporation within the meaning of this section.

"(f) China trade act corporations: A corporation organized under the China Trade Act, 1922, shall not be deemed to be affiliated with any other corporation within the meaning of this section.

"(g) Corporations deriving income from possessions of United States: For the purposes of this section a corporation entitled to the benefits of section 251, by reason of receiving a large percentage of its income from possessions of the United States, shall be treated as a foreign corporation.

"(h) Subsidiary formed to comply with foreign law: In the case of a domestic corporation owning or controlling, directly or indirectly, 100 percent of the capital stock (exclusive of directors' qualifying shares) of a corporation organized under the laws of a contiguous foreign country and maintained solely for the purpose of complying with the laws of such country as to title and operation of property, such foreign corporation may, at the option of the domestic corporation, be treated for the purpose of this title as a domestic corporation.

"(i) Suspension of running of statute of limitations: If a notice under section 272 (a) in respect of a deficiency for any taxable year is mailed to a corporation, the suspension of the running of the statute of limitations, provided in section 277, shall apply in the case of corporations with which such corporation made a consolidated return for such taxable year.

"(j) Allocation of income and deductions: For allocation of income and deductions of related trades or businesses see section 45."

In the case of a foreign life-insurance company the credit shall not exceed an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount otherwise allowed as a credit as the reserve funds required by law and held by it at the end of the taxable year upon business transacted within the United States is of the reserve funds held by it at the end of the taxable year upon all business transacted."

And the Senate agree to the same.

CORPORATE REORGANIZATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5884) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

Mr. VAN NUYS. I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments to House bill 5884 may be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will state the first committee amendment.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 2, line 14, after the word "stating", to insert "the requisite jurisdictional facts under this section; the nature of the business of the debtor; in brief description, the assets, liabilities, capital stock, and financial condition of the debtor; if a prior proceeding is pending, the name of the court in which it is pending and the nature of such proceeding; facts showing the need for relief under this section; and"; on page 3, line 1, after the word "assets", to insert a comma and "or in the territorial jurisdiction in which it was incorporated"; on the same page, in line 19, after the word "debtor", to strike out "on the ground of insolvency" and insert "by reason of its inability to pay its debts as they mature"; and on page 5, line 6, after the word "deny", to strike out "either the jurisdiction of the court or that the claims of the petitioning creditors constitute such necessary amounts or that the corporation is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature" and insert "any material allegation of the petition", so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", as amended by the acts of February 5, 1903, June 15, 1906, June 25, 1910, March 2, 1917, January 7, 1922, May 27, 1926, February 11, 1932, and March 3, 1933, be, and it is hereby, amended by adding to chapter VIII, entitled "Provisions for the relief of debtors", two new sections to read as follows:

"SEC. 78. Additional jurisdiction: In addition to the jurisdiction exercised in voluntary and involuntary proceedings to adjudge persons bankrupt, courts of bankruptcy shall exercise original jurisdiction in proceedings for the relief of debtors, as provided in section 79 of this act.

"SEC. 79. Corporate reorganizations: (a) Any corporation which could become a bankrupt under section 4 of this act, and any railroad or other transportation corporation, except a railroad corporation authorized to file a petition or answer under the provisions of section 77 of this act, and except as hereinafter provided, may file an original petition, or, before adjudication in an involuntary proceeding, an answer, or in any proceeding pending in bankruptcy, a petition stating the requisite jurisdictional facts under this section; the nature of the business of the debtor; in brief description, the assets, liabilities, capital stock, and financial condition of the debtor; if a prior proceeding is pending, the name of the court in which it is pending and the nature of such proceeding; facts showing the need for relief under this section; and that the corporation is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature and that it desires to effect a plan of reorganization. The petition shall be filed with the court in whose territorial jurisdiction the corporation, during the preceding 6 months or the greater portion thereof, has had its principal place of business or its principal assets, or in the territorial jurisdiction in which it was incorporated. The petition or answer shall be accompaned by payment to the clerk of a filing fee of $100, which shall be in addition to the fees required to be collected by the clerk under other sections of this act. Upon the filing of such a petition or answer the judge shall enter an order either approving it as properly filed under this section if satisfied that such petition or answer complies with this section and has been filed in good faith, or dismissing it. If the petition or answer is so approved, an order of adjudication in bankruptcy shall not be entered and the court in which such order approving the petition or answer is entered shall, during the pendency of the proceedings under this section, have exclusive jurisdiction of the debtor and its property wherever located for the purposes of this section, and shall have and may exercise all the powers, not inconsistent with this section, which a Federal court would have had it appointed a receiver in equity of the property of the debtor by reason of its inability to pay its debts as they mature. The corporation shall be referred to in the proceedings as a 'debtor.' Any corporation the majority of the capital stock of which having power to vote for the election of directors is owned, either directly or indirectly through an intervening medium, by any debtor, or substantially all of whose properties are operated by such debtor under lease or operating agreement, may file, with the court in which such debtor had filed its petition or answer, and in the same proceeding, a petition stating that it is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature and that it desires to effect a plan of reorganization in connection with, or as a part of, the plan of reorganization of such other debtor; and thereupon such court, if it approves such petition, shall have the same jurisdiction with respect to such corporation, its property, and its creditors and stockholders as the court has with respect to such other debtor. Three or more creditors who have provable claims against any corporation which amount in the aggregate in excess of the value of securities held by them, if any, to $1,000 or over may, if such corporation has not filed a petition or answer under this section, file with the court in which such corporation might file a petition under this section, a petition stating that such corporation is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature and has committed an act of bankruptcy within 4 months; that such creditors propose that it shall effect a reorganization; and such corporation shall, within 10 days after the service of a copy of such petition upon it, answer such petition. If such answer shall admit (a) the jurisdiction of the court, (b) that the claims of the petitioning creditors constitute the amounts necessary to entitle them to file such petition under this section, and (c) that the corporation is either insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature, the court shall enter an order approving the petition as properly filed under this section if satisfied that it complies with this section and has been filed in good faith, or dismiss it if not so satisfied. If such answer shall deny any material allegation of the petition, the judge shall determine summarily the issues presented by the pleadings, without the intervention of a jury, and if the material allegations of the petition are sustained by the proofs and the court is satisfied that the petition complies with this section and has been filed in good faith, it shall approve the petition; otherwise the court shall dismiss the petition; and if any such petition shall be so approved, the proceedings thereon shall continue with like effect as if the corporation had itself filed a petition or answer under this section. In case any such petition or answer or proceedings shall be dismissed in the manner provided in this subdivision (a) or in subdivision (c), clause (8) of this section, the same shall not constitute an act of bankruptcy or an admission of insolvency or be admissible in evidence, without the consent of the debtor, in any proceedings then or thereafter pending or commenced under this act or in any Federal or State court. If three or more creditors who have provable claims which amount in the aggregate in excess of the value of securities held by them, if any, to $1,000 or over, or if stockholders holding 5 percent in number of all shares of stock of any class of the debtor outstanding shall, prior to the hearing provided for in subdivision (c), clause (1), of this section appear and controvert the facts alleged in the petition or answer, the judge shall determine as soon as may be the issues presented by the pleadings, without the intervention of a jury, and unless the material allegations of the petition or answer are sustained by the proofs, the proceedings shall be dismissed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 3, after the word "stockholders" and the comma, to strike out "a majority of which shall not" and insert "of which less than a majority shall"; in line 18, after the word "creditors", to insert "of which less than"; in the same line, after the word "amount", to strike out "of which shall not" and insert "shall"; on page 9, line 16, after the word "purposes" and the semicolon, to strike out "and"; in line 17, after the word "debtor", to insert "and may include any other appropriate provisions not inconsistent with this section"; on page 11, line 7, before the word "or", to insert "by an attorney at law,"; and in line 8, after the word "committee" and the period to insert "The running of all periods of time prescribed by any other provisions of this act, and by all statutes of limitations, shall be suspended during the pendency of a proceeding under this section", so as to read:

(b) A plan of reorganization within the meaning of this section (1) shall include provisions modifying or altering the rights of creditors generally, or of any class of them, secured or unsecured, either through the issuance of new securities of any character or otherwise; (2) may include provisions modifying or altering the rights of stockholders generally, or of any class of them, either through the issuance of new securities of any character or otherwise; (3) shall provide for the payment in cash of all costs of administration and other allowances made by the court except that compensation or reimbursement provided for in subdivision (c), clause (9), of this section, may be paid in securities provided for in the plan if those entitled thereto will accept such payment and the court finds such compensation reasonable; (4) shall provide in respect of each class of stockholders, of which less than a majority shall accept such plan (unless the judge shall determine either that the debtor is insolvent, or that the interest of such class of stockholders will not be affected adversely by the plan), adequate protection for the realization by them of the value of their equity, if any, in the property of the debtor dealt with by the plan, either, as provided in the plan (a) by a sale of the property at not less than a fair upset price, or (b) by appraisal and payment in cash of the value either of their stock, or at the objecting stockholders' election, of the securities allotted to such stockholders under the plan, if any shall be so allotted, or (c) by such methods as will do substantial justice to such stockholders under and consistent with the circumstances of the particular case; (5) shall provide in respect of each class of creditors of which less than two thirds in amount shall accept such plan (unless the claims of such class of creditors will not be affected by the plan, or the plan makes provision for the payment of their claims in cash in full), provide adequate protection for the realization by them of the value of their interests, claims, or liens, if the property affected by such interests, claims, or liens is dealt with by the plan, either as provided in the plan (a) by the transfer or sale of such property subject to such interests, claims, or liens, or by the retention of such property by the debtor subject to such interests, claims, or liens, or (b) by a sale free of such interests, claims, or liens at not less than a fair upset price and the transfer of such interests, claims, or liens to the proceeds of such sale; or (c) by appraisal and payment either in cash of the value either of such interests, claims, or liens, or, at the objecting creditors' election, of the securities allotted to such interests, claims, or liens under the plan, if any shall be so allotted; or (d) by such method as will in the opinion of the judge, under and consistent with the circumstances of the particular case, equitably and fairly provide such protection; (6) may reject contracts of the debtor which are executory in whole or in part, including unexpired leases except contracts in the public authority; (7) shall, in case any creditor or stockholder or class thereof shall not be affected by the plan, specify the creditor or stockholder or class or classes thereof not affected and contain such provisions with respect thereto as may be appropriate, and in case any controversy shall arise as to whether any creditor or stockholder or class thereof shall or shall not be affected, the issue shall be determined by the judge after hearing upon notice to the parties interested; (8) shall specify what claims, if any, are to be paid in cash in full; (9) shall provide adequate means for the execution of the plan, which may include the transfer of all or any part of the property of the debtor to another corporation or to other corporations, or the consolidation of the properties of the debtor with those of another corporation, or the merger or consolidation of the debtor into or with another corporation or corporations, or the retention of the property by the debtor, the distribution of assets among creditors or any class thereof, the satisfaction or modification of liens, indentures, or other similar instruments, the curing or waiver of defaults, extension of maturity dates of outstanding securities, the change in interest rates and other terms of such securities, the amendment of the charter of the debtor, and the issuance of securities of either the debtor or any such corporation or corporations, for cash, or in exchange for existing securities, or in satisfaction of claims or rights, or for other appropriate purposes; (10) may deal with all or any part of the property of the debtor and may include any other appropriate provisions not inconsistent with this section. No creditor or stockholder shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be affected by any plan of reorganization unless the same shall affect his interests materially and adversely. The term "securities" shall include evidences of indebtedness, either secured or unsecured, stock, certificates of beneficial interest therein, and certificates of beneficial interest in property. The term "stockholder" shall include the holders of voting-trust certificates. The term "creditors" shall include for all purposes of this section and of the reorganization plan, its acceptance and confirmation, all holders of claims of whatever character against the debtor or its property, including claims under executory contracts and for future rent, whether or not such claims would otherwise constitute provable claims under this act. The term "claims" includes debts, securities, other than stock, liens, or other interests of whatever character. For all purposes of this section, unsecured claims which would have been entitled to priority over existing mortgages if a receiver in equity of the property of the debtor had been appointed by a Federal court on the day of the approval of the petition or answer under this section shall be entitled to such priority, and the holders of such claims, and of other claims, if any, of equal rank, shall be treated as a separate class of creditors. In case any executory contract shall be rejected, the same shall be deemed to have been breached and the holder shall be entitled to file a claim for damages for such breach and such claim may be allowed provided such contract shall not have been terminated by forfeiture, reentry or otherwise. In the case of secured claims entitled to the provisions of clause (5) of this subdivision (b), the value of the security shall be determined in the manner provided in section 57, clause (h) of this act, and if the amount of such value shall be less than the amount of the claim, the excess may be classified as an unsecured claim. The provisions of section 60 of this act shall apply to claims against the debtor in a proceeding under this section. For all purposes of this section any creditor may act in person, by an attorney at law, or by a duly authorized agent or committee. The running of all periods of time prescribed by any other provisions of this act, and by all statutes of limitations, shall be suspended during the pendency of a proceeding under this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 1, after the word "and", to strike out "reimbursed" and insert "reimbursement"; and in line 6, after the word "foregoing", to insert "and of the debtor", so as to read:

(c) Upon approving the petition or answer or at any time thereafter, the judge, in addition to the jurisdiction and powers elsewhere in this section conferred upon him, (1) may, after hearing upon notice to the debtor and to such others as the judge may determine temporarily continue the debtor in possession or appoint a trustee or trustees of the debtor's estate, and shall require the debtor, or such trustee or trustees, if appointed, to give such notice as the order may direct to creditors and stockholders and to cause publication thereof to be made at least once a week for 2 successive weeks of a hearing to be held within 30 days after such appointment, or, if no such appointment, within 30 days after the approval of the petition or answer, at which hearing or any adjournment thereof, or at any subsequent hearing after notice, the judge may make permanent any such appointment, or terminate it and restore the debtor to possession, or, if no trustee has been appointed, may appoint a trustee or trustees, and may remove any such trustee or trustees and continue the debtor in possession or appoint a substitute trustee or trustees and may appoint an additional trustee or trustees; (2) shall fix the amount of the bond of every such trustee, and every such trustee, upon filing such bond, shall have all the title and shall exercise, subject to the control of the judge and consistently with the provisions of this section, all the powers of a trustee appointed pursuant to section 44 of this act, and if authorized by the judge, the same powers as those exercised by a receiver in equity to the extent consistent with this section, and, subject to the authorization and control of the judge, the power to operate the business of the debtor during such period, fixed or indefinite, as the judge may from time to time prescribe; (3) may, for cause shown, authorize the debtor or the trustee or trustees, if appointed, to issue certificates for cash, property, or other consideration approved by the judge for such lawful purposes, and upon such terms and conditions and with such security and such priority in payments over existing obligations, secured or unsecured, as may be lawful in the particular case; (4) shall require the debtor, or the trustee or trustees if appointed, at such time or times as the judge may direct, and in lieu of the schedules required by section 7 of this act, to file such schedules and submit such other information as may be necessary to disclose the conduct of the debtor's affairs and the fairness of any proposed plan; and may direct the debtor, or the trustee or trustees if appointed, to prepare (a) a list of all known bondholders and creditors of, or claimants against, the debtor or its property, and the amounts and character of their debts, claims, and securities, and the last known post-office address or place of business of each creditor or claimant, and (b) a list of the stockholders of each class of the debtor, with the last known post-office address or place of business of each, which lists shall be open to the inspection of any creditor or stockholder of the debtor, during reasonable business hours, upon application to the debtor, or to the trustee or trustees, if appointed, and the contents of such lists shall not constitute admissions by the debtor or the trustees in a proceeding under this section or otherwise; (5) may direct the rejection of contracts of the debtor executory in whole or in part; (6) shall determine a reasonable time within which the claims and interests of creditors and stockholders may be filed or evidenced and after which no such claim or interest may participate in any plan, except on order for cause shown, the manner in which such claims and interest may be filed or evidenced and allowed, and, for the purposes of the plan and its acceptance, the division of creditors and stockholders into classes according to the nature of their respective claims and interests; and may, for the purposes of such classification, classify as an unsecured claim the amount of any secured claim in excess of the value of the security therefor, such value to be determined in accordance with the provisions of section 57, clause (h), of this act; (7) shall cause reasonable notice of such determination and of all hearings for the consideration of any proposed plan, or of the dismissal of the proceedings, or the liquidation of the estate, or the allowance of fees or expenses, to be given creditors and stockholders by publication or otherwise; (8) if a plan of reorganization is not proposed or accepted within such reasonable period as the judge may fix, or, if proposed and accepted, is not confirmed, may, after hearing, whether the proceeding be voluntary or involuntary, either extend such period or dismiss the proceeding under this section or, except in the case of a railroad or other public utility or of a debtor which has not been found by the judge to be insolvent, direct the estate to be liquidated, or direct the trustee or trustees to liquidate the estate, appointing a trustee or trustees if none shall previously have been appointed, as the interests of the creditors and stockholders may equitably require; (9) may allow a reasonable compensation for the services rendered and reimbursement for the actual and necessary expenses incurred in connection with the proceeding and the plan by officers, parties in interest, depositaries, reorganization managers and committees or other representatives of creditors or stockholders, and the attorneys or agents of any of the foregoing and of the debtor, but appeals from orders fixing such allowances may be taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals independently of other appeals in the proceeding and shall be heard summarily; (10) in addition to the provisions of section 11 of this act for the staying of pending suits against the debtor, may enjoin or stay the commencement or continuation of suits against the debtor until after final decree; and may, upon notice and for cause shown, enjoin or stay the commencement or continuance of any judicial proceeding to enforce any lien upon the estate until after final decree; and (11) may refer any matters to a special master, who may be one of the referees in bankruptcy, for consideration and report, either generally or upon specified issues, and allow such master a reasonable compensation and reimbursement for his services and actual and necessary expenses. The debtor shall have the right to be heard on all questions. Any creditor or stockholder shall have the right to be heard on the question of the permanent appointment of any trustee or trustees, and on the proposed confirmation of any reorganization plan, and upon filing a petition for leave to intervene, on such other questions arising in the proceeding as the judge shall determine. In case a trustee is not appointed, the debtor shall continue in the possession of its property, and, if authorized by the judge, shall operate the business thereof during such period, fixed or indefinite, as the judge may from time to time prescribe, and shall have all the title to and shall exercise, consistently with the provisions of this section, all the powers of a trustee appointed pursuant to this section, subject at all times to the control of the judge, and to such limitations, restrictions, terms, and conditions as the judge may from time to time impose and prescribe. While the debtor is in possession (a) its officers shall be entitled to receive only such reasonable compensation as the judge shall from time to time approve, and (b) no person shall be elected or appointed to any office, to fill a vacancy or otherwise, without the prior approval of the judge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 24, after the word "thereto" and the comma, to strike out "the same and the orders of the judge relative thereto, shall be put into effect and carried out"; on page 23, line 2, after the word "the", to strike out "plan shall be" and insert "plan, when"; on the same page, line 5, before the word "retained",

All securities issued pursuant to any plan of reorganization confirmed by the court in accordance with the provisions of this section, including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, any securities issued pursuant to such plan for the purpose of raising money for working capital and other purposes of such plan and securities issued by the debtor or by the trustee or trustees pursuant to subdivision (c), clause (3), of this section, and all certificates of deposit representing securities of or claims against the debtor which it is proposed to deal with under any such plan, shall be exempt from all the provisions of the Securities Act of 1933, approved May 27, 1933, except the provisions of subdivision (2) of section 12, and section 17 thereof.

So as to read:

(h) Upon final confirmation of the plan, the debtor and other corporation or corporations organized or to be organized for the purpose of carrying out the plan, shall have full power and authority to, and shall put into effect and carry out the plan and the orders of the judge relative thereto, under and subject to the supervision and control of the judge, and the property dealt with by the plan, when transferred and conveyed by the trustee or trustees to the debtor or the other corporation or corporations provided for by the plan, or, if no trustee has been appointed, when retained by the debtor pursuant to the plan or transferred by it to the other corporation or corporations provided for by the plan, shall be free and clear of all claims of the debtor, its stockholders and creditors, except such as may consistently with the provisions of the plan be reserved in the order confirming the plan or directing such transfer and conveyance or retention, and the court may direct the trustee or trustees, or if there be no trustee, the debtor and any mortgagee, the trustee of any obligation of the debtor, and all other proper and necessary parties, to make any such transfer or conveyance, and may direct the debtor to join in any such transfer or conveyance made by the trustee or trustees. Upon the termination of the proceedings a final decree shall be entered discharging the trustee or trustees, if any, making such provisions as may be equitable, by way of injunction or otherwise, and closing the case. Such final decree shall discharge the debtor from its debts and liabilities, and shall terminate and end all rights and interests of its stockholders, except as provided in the plan or as may be reserved as aforesaid. All securities issued pursuant to any plan of reorganization confirmed by the court in accordance with the provisions of this section, including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, any securities issued pursuant to such plan for the purpose of raising money for working capital and other purposes of such plan and securities issued by the debtor or by the trustee or trustees pursuant to subdivision (c), clause (3), of this section, and all certificates of deposit representing securities of or claims against the debtor which it is proposed to deal with under any such plan, shall be exempt from all the provisions of the Securities Act of 1933, approved May 27, 1933, except the provisions of subdivision (2) of section 12, and section 17 thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 22, after the word "corporation", to strike out "which claims shall be liquidated under section 63 (b) of this act", and insert "but the claim of a landlord for anticipatory breach of an unexpired lease of real estate shall in no event be allowed in an amount exceeding the rent reserved by the lease for the year next succeeding the date of the surrender of the premises", so as to read:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. What is the status of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair stated that the question was on the engrossment and third reading of the bill. No one objected, but two Senators were on their feet apparently asking for recognition. The Chair takes for granted that they desire to discuss the bill and will hold the bill was not passed. The Senator from Indiana offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 24, in line 13, it is proposed to strike out the period after the word "thereof", insert a comma, and add the following: "and except the provisions of section 24 thereof as applied to any wilful violation of said section 17."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That being an amendment to the committee amendment, it will be necessary to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to. Without objection the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to the committee amendment is agreed to, and, without objection, the committee amendment, as amended, is agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 13, after the word "bankruptcy", it is proposed to insert "whether or not the corporation has been adjudicated a bankrupt."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment explained.

Mr. HASTINGS. The bill as amended by the committee provides that "before adjudication in an involuntary proceeding, an answer" may be filed, "or in any proceeding pending in bankruptcy a petition" may be filed setting forth "the requisite jurisdictional facts under this section." The proposed amendment would make it read that a corporation may file a petition or an answer, "or in any proceeding pending in bankruptcy, whether or not the corporation has been adjudicated a bankrupt, a petition stating the requisite jurisdictional facts under this section."

The amendments which I have to propose are the result of conferences with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] and of various complaints we have had about the bill, which amendments we agreed ought to be adopted by the Senate. This provision is the first one which creates jurisdiction.

Mr. BLACK. On what page is it?

Mr. HASTINGS. On page 2. There was a clarifying amendment suggested, but for the moment I have forgotten just what it was.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator will yield, I will state the reason why I desired to have the amendment explained in order that we may be informed as to its object and purpose. It has been my understanding there were some amendments to be proposed which had for their object conferring jurisdiction upon the courts of Delaware with reference to bankruptcies where companies were doing business in other States. I am interested to know whether or not these amendments are along that line.

Mr. HASTINGS. Not at all. These are amendments which have been suggested to the Senator from Indiana and myself by various persons interested in the bill. There are several of them.

Mr. BLACK. They have no connection whatever with the amendment which appears on page 3 of the bill?

Mr. HASTINGS. Not at all.

Mr. BLACK. They are disconnected?

Mr. HASTINGS. Entirely so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. I offer the amendment which I now send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 23, it is proposed to strike out "(b) that the claims of the petitioning creditors constitute the amounts necessary to entitle them to file such petition under this section, and (c) that the corporation is either insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature," and insert in lieu thereof "and (b) the material allegations of the petition."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 18, after the word "and," it is proposed to insert "if a prior proceeding in bankruptcy or equity receivership is not pending, that it", so as to read:

A petition stating that such corporation is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature and, if a prior proceeding in bankruptcy or equity receivership is not pending, that it has committed an act of bankruptcy within 4 months—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted on page 10.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 10, line 6, it is proposed to strike out the words "and for future rent."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. I offer another amendment, to come in on page 10.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 10, it is proposed to strike out the following sentence, beginning on line 18:

In case any executory contract shall be rejected, the same shall be deemed to have been breached and the holder shall be entitled to file a claim for damages for such breach, and such claim may be allowed, provided such contract shall not have been terminated by forfeiture, reentry, or otherwise.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

In case any executory contract or unexpired lease of real estate shall be rejected pursuant to direction of the judge given in a proceeding instituted under this section, or shall have been rejected by a trustee in bankruptcy or receiver in equity in a proceeding pending prior to the institution of a proceeding under this section, any person injured by such rejection shall, for all purposes of this section and of the reorganization plan, its acceptance and confirmation, be deemed to be a creditor to the extent of the injury resulting from such rejection: Provided, That the claim of a landlord for injury resulting from the rejection of an unexpired lease of real estate or for damages or indemnity under a covenant contained in such lease shall not be treated as a claim ranking on a parity with debts which would be provable under section 63 (a) of this act, except up to an amount equal to the rent reserved by said lease for the year next succeeding the date of the order approving the petition or answer under this section plus an amount equal to the unpaid rent accrued up to said date, but the balance, if any, of such claim shall be subordinated in rank to debts so provable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. I offer an amendment to come in on page 22.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 22, it is proposed to strike out in line 5, "sections 721, 722, 723, 724, and 725 of the revenue act", and insert in lieu thereof the following:

subdivisions 1, 2, and 3 of schedule A of title VIII of the Revenue Act of 1926, as amended by sections 721, 722, and 723 of the Revenue Act of 1932 and the provisions of sections 724 and 725 of the Revenue Act—

So as to read:

The provisions of subdivisions 1, 2, and 3 of schedule A of title VIII of the Revenue Act of 1926, as amended by sections 721, 722, and 723 of the Revenue Act of 1932 and the provisions of sections 724 and 725 of the Revenue Act of 1932 shall not apply to the issuance, transfers, or exchanges of securities—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. I submit another amendment to come in on page 31.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 31, lines 23 and 24, it is proposed to strike out the words "anticipatory breach of an unexpired lease of real estate" and insert in lieu thereof the words:

injury resulting from the rejection by the trustee of an unexpired lease of real estate or for damages or indemnity under a covenant contained in such lease.

So as to read:

But the claim of a landlord for injury resulting from the rejection by the trustee of an unexpired lease of real estate or for damages or indemnity under a covenant contained in such lease shall in no event be allowed in an amount exceeding the rent reserved by the lease for the year next succeeding the date of the surrender of the premises.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That being an amendment to the committee amendment, it will be necessary to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment at the bottom of page 31 was agreed to is reconsidered. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Delaware to the committee amendment is agreed to. Without objection, the committee amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I offer another amendment, to be inserted on page 32.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 32, after the word "premises", in line 3, it is proposed to add:

Plus an amount equal to the unpaid rent accrued up to said date.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This amendment is to a committee amendment which has heretofore been agreed to. Without objection, the vote whereby the committee amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered.

The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the Senate adopted the committee amendment appearing at the top of page 3.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment referred to by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the top of page 3, line 1, after the word "assets", the committee proposed to insert the words

"or in the territorial jurisdiction in which it was incorporated."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the action of the Senate in agreeing to the amendment will be reconsidered. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I am not prepared to make any remarks on this matter. I simply desire to call attention to the effect of this amendment. It strikes at a rather vital thing, it seems to me, in the corporate structure of the Nation.

I have long thought that the Federal Government would be compelled sooner or later to adopt regulations which would prevent certain States from permitting corporations to be organized on lax terms and without proper provisions for safeguarding the rights of the stockholders and the people. There are several States in the Nation which have invited corporations to come into their territory and be organized on the same basis on which we know certain other States have invited those who are suffering from domestic troubles to find their habitation therein for a short period of time in order to permit the divorce courts to acquire jurisdiction. This amendment, in my judgment, would encourage a continuation of the conditions which have been tolerated in this country with reference to the freedom and laxness of corporate laws in certain States.

The bill as it was originally written provided on page 2:

The petition shall be filed with the court in whose territorial jurisdiction the corporation, during the preceding 6 months or the greater portion thereof, has had its principal place of business or its principal assets.

The amendment added is as follows:

Or in the territorial jurisdiction in which it was incorporated.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. That amendment complies entirely with the old bankruptcy law.

Mr. BLACK. I am not familiar with the old law; but, frankly, I have thought for some time that the time has arrived when Congress must take cognizance of the fact that in order to protect stockholders of corporations, to protect purchasers of corporate stock, and to protect the rights of the people themselves, it is necessary to enact some kind of Federal legislation to put an end to the system which has grown up in several States of inviting all who will to come within certain territories and organize a corporation under terms and conditions which would not be tolerated in other States.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the Senator has in mind in particular the State of Delaware, I call his attention to the fact that this administration has availed itself of the law of the State of Delaware to incorporate three or four corporations for emergency purposes.

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator that that would not change my idea about the situation at all.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Referring to what the Senator from Alabama has said, I know that in several cases where stockholders' committees, particularly minority interests, have been involved, the corporation has escaped law suits by moving the case, and unless some legislation shall be enacted permitting the corporation to be sued outside the place where the action takes place, many of the minority stockholders will have no redress at all. That is particularly true of public utilities whose stock issues have been widely distributed, and subsequently there have been receiverships. In many such cases minority interests have had no rights at all, due to the fact that suit could be brought in only one locality, while the assets of the company were in other localities. Is the Senator addressing himself to that phase of the question?

Mr. BLACK. No; I am addressing myself now only to the phase of the matter which would give jurisdiction under this bankruptcy statute to the territory in which the company was organized, even though the major portion of the business may be carried on in another State.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has in mind the same thought I am expounding; namely, that, unless the jurisdiction shall be broadened, many of the minority stockholders in receiverships and suits of similar kind will be barred from having their rights protected, because the majority will select the place of instituting suit, and the others who have often been the victims of chicanery will have no redress at all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Would not the evil of which the Senator complains be remedied by the State passing a law requiring that agents of a corporation be designated within the State, so that the corporation could be sued within the State?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is probably true; but it would take a large number of State laws to do it.

Mr. BORAH. Most of them have such laws.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not the brief before me, but in the receiverships of four or five gas companies with which a very prominent man in my own State was identified, I think he proved conclusively, having made a digest of the cases, that the minority interests in those receiverships were practically frozen out, and had to take whatever was offered to them, and had no redress in court.

Mr. BORAH. We passed a bill yesterday to freeze out the minority.

Mr. HASTINGS. This particular amendment does not go to that point. There is a very serious question, to which the committee gave long and careful consideration, with respect to freezing out a minority; but finally we reached the conclusion that probably the only way in which we could make this measure effective at all was to force the minority to come into line when they were offered certain securities which the court considered adequate.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was not debating the advisability of eliminating the minority under certain conditions. I was complaining of eliminating the minority due to lack of opportunity on the part of the minority to bring suit in certain localities. In other words, where a set-up exists which is not fair to the stockholders, but is designed by a large group interest to get hold of a company without regard to the minority stockholders, there are in some cases flaws in the law which prevent the minority on jurisdictional grounds from bringing the matter into court.

Mr. HASTINGS. I should like to say to the Senator from Alabama that this provision is not intended in any way to enlarge the opportunity which gives rise to the particular objection he has to the States having these corporation laws. As is well known, Delaware is one of them. I have been expecting that at any time the Federal Congress might take action which would result in the enactment of a uniform law with respect to that subject; but that is wholly outside this question. Here we are giving three opportunities for the filing of the petition—the place where the principal office is, the place where the principal assets are, and the place where the company is incorporated. Of course, the petitioners go to the place where the company is incorporated only when it is uncertain, as it is in many instances, in just what place the jurisdiction lies. That is the reason why the old bankruptcy law contains this provision; and this amendment is merely to comply with the old bankruptcy law.

I hope the Senator will not object to the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. I shall not detain the Senate long. I merely desire to place clearly before the Senate the idea which I have with reference to the amendment.

Some time ago I read, in one of the current magazines, an article by Mr. John T. Flynn. I had been to the State of Delaware, and had noticed some of the signs mentioned in the article. For instance, if a person goes to certain buildings in the State of Delaware he will find on the directory the names of hundreds of companies that exist on the ground floor. It would be wholly and completely impossible, of course, for those hundreds of companies really to have active offices in the State of Delaware. The writer of this article explained how they secured their agents. One man can be the agent for 50 to 100 companies.

Mr. HASTINGS. Or a thousand.

Mr. BLACK. Or a thousand; the Senator is right. In other words, the company organizes under the laws of the State of Delaware or one of the other States that are hospitable toward corporate organization. It never transacts a dollar's worth of business in the State, except to organize under the amazing system I have seen of A stock and B stock and C stock and D stock and E stock and Z stock and all other kinds of stock; and then a man is employed as an agent who represents that company in part, and perhaps represents a thousand other companies in part.

I do not believe that the State in which a corporation is organized in that way, and in which it never was intended that the corporation should do any business, should have any jurisdiction over the bankruptcy of the corporation. The lawyers who organized the corporation these are already making all they need out of the organization of the corporation, without having so many juicy receiverships—and, unfortunately, they have been too juicy. I do not refer to any one State. I refer now to the country at large; but they have been entirely too juicy.

Bear in mind that the objection I have to this amendment is that it probably would create a race each time a corporation becomes a little failing in health. There are numerous lawyers who are always waiting to see whether or not there has been a trifling delay in the payment of a bill, and it would give room for a race between the States; and I should say that the State that had treated the corporation with sufficient hospitality to permit it to organize within its boundaries, even though the corporation never intended to do a dollar's worth of business in the State, would usually be on the alert, and probably there is where the receivership or the bankruptcy would be tried out. In other words, I believe Congress should discourage right here and now, while it has the opportunity, the idea of organizing a corporation in a State when the organizers of the corporation never had any idea or conception in their minds that it would be possible to transact any business in that State.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am quite certain that this provision does not in any way cure the evils which the Senator thinks may exist, or have any influence on them. If at sometime the Senator should propose to do away with the rights of the States to incorporate companies, as he suggests, I should be glad to debate the matter with him, but I hope he will not insist on striking out this amendment, because it is very essential to the proper working of the bill. If I were speaking for the interests of individuals in my State, I would not be for the bill. I think it is a good bill.

I think it will help in the reorganization of numerous distressed corporations, and I know in many instances it is quite important that they should have opportunity to go to more than one place, because a serious question arises in many instances as to whether they have a right to go to a particular place or not. They can always go to the territorial jurisdiction in which the company was incorporated. That was the purpose of putting the provision in the bill. I hope the Senator will at least permit the matter to go to conference.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The bill provides that the jurisdiction shall be where the assets are?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; where the principal office is or the principal assets are, or the place where the corporation was incorporated. There are many corporations in this country, whether they are to be praised or not, which have their property so distributed, and their principal offices so uncertain, that in some instances it would be difficult to tell where they were. I say to the Senator that the committee, particularly the Senator from Indiana and myself, have had quite a good deal of correspondence and requests about the matter. In two or three instances our correspondents agreed with the Senator from Alabama, but in most instances they urged that this amendment be agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I conclude my remarks with this statement: The place where receiverships should be adjudicated is in the court where the assets of the company exist. That is the place where it may be done most expeditiously.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, that is where it would usually be done, I am quite certain.

Mr. BLACK. I do not believe it would be. I remember reading a short time ago about one of the moving-picture concerns, which, as I understand, does business mainly in California, and to some extent throughout the Nation, but which was organized under the laws of Delaware. I mention that one merely because I happened to notice an article about it at the time, though I may be wrong; the Senator from Delaware may know about it, and I may not know, but I supposed it was one of those instances where the corporation was actually organized in Delaware, although its business was chiefly done in other States.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think what the Senator has in mind is that under the present law the proposal for reorganization would come to the equity court at the place where the company was incorporated, as a matter of course. This measure would take all that jurisdiction away from the equity court, would take it entirely away, and put it with the bankruptcy court.

I may state to the Senate that in my State lawyers are engaged largely in these reorganizations, and they not only came before the committee to oppose the bill but almost unanimously they have appealed to me to be against it. I have pointed out to them that I cannot afford to be against a bill which I believe will be helpful to the country merely because it would affect the legal business of the lawyers with whom I am associated. They insisted, of course, that it would not be helpful; they pointed out many objections to it; but neither the other members of the subcommittee nor myself agreed that the objections they made were proper objections. We overruled them, and I have gone along with the whole committee, notwithstanding all this pressure.

The amendment about which I am now talking does not deal with that matter at all, but I know from experience, and I know from what has been said to me by persons engaged in corporate reorganizations, that in some instances it would be necessary for them to come to Delaware.

I might say that if the distinguished Senator from Alabama knew the feeling of the Federal courts in our State about the minorities, and how careful they are to protect them, he would not hesitate, so far as my State is concerned, to trust the matter to those particular courts.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I will state that it is not a question of objection to any State, but I know, for instance, from a study of the companies which do business in Alabama, what the situation is. Every stockholder may live in Alabama; the stockholders may never have lived anywhere else except in Alabama; they probably have had no intention of living anywhere else except in Alabama; they do all their business in Alabama except to organize the corporation; they never have done any corporate business anywhere except in Alabama; but under this bill, with all of the stockholders living in Alabama, with all of the business being done in Alabama, with all the witnesses to the proceedings necessarily in Alabama, if a receivership should be called for up in Delaware, the stockholders would be compelled to bear the burden of the expenses of having the receivership administered in a State practically across the entire United States when there is no reason for it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator is correct in the construction he gives to the bill, that is a serious objection, but I understood that the jurisdiction might be availed of where the assets were.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct; it possibly could be; but the Senator knows what happens, because he has been familiar for some time with the way in which interested parties rush into various jurisdictions to see which one can get it first. Naturally, if it can be gotten a thousand miles away, the lawyers would not care; they are perfectly willing. Unfortunately, it is true, although I am a member of the profession myself; unfortunately, it has been demonstrated that they wait, just like buzzards waiting for the dead carcass, until there is some slight chance of throwing a company into bankruptcy, and then go into the court that is the closest to them.

I do not admit that it is right for a company all of whose stockholders, for instance, might live in the State of Idaho, the business of which was done only in the State of Idaho, to have its receivership determined in the courts of Delaware. Under the pending bill that is exactly what could be done, and under the actual practice that is exactly what would be done.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will not the Senator repeat that statement? I am not familiar with the bill, but I am interested very much in these peculiar receiverships.

Mr. BLACK. The statement I make is that if a corporation is organized under the laws of Delaware, as the majority of them seem to be, and each stockholder in the company lives in the State of Idaho, always has lived there, all of the business of the corporation is done in the State of Idaho, not a dollar's worth of business is done in the State of Delaware except the payment of the license tax, if all of the business is done in the State of Idaho, and all of the stockholders live there, always have lived there, and always will live there, under this bill the State of Delaware would have jurisdiction of the receivership.

Mr. BORAH. Sole jurisdiction?

Mr. JOHNSON. Would it have exclusive jurisdiction?

Mr. BLACK. It would not have exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I point out that before the corporation can move at all for the purpose of reorganization, before it can do anything, it must have the necessary majority of the various creditors and the stockholders? That is not true, however, of the minority.

Under certain conditions the minority can start the proceeding, and they may pick their own court, so that if the minority be interested in starting the proceeding it can go where it believes the principal place of business to be or where it believes the principal assets to be. But I point out that in frequent cases it will be impossible for a stockholder or creditor to know where the principal office is or where the principal assets are. He may be uncertain about that. If he be uncertain, he ought to have a place where he knows he may go. Under this bill there will be two places.

Mr. BLACK. He could know exactly where he could go, because the court would determine. If this amendment should be defeated, the matter could be tried out where the company had its principal place of business or its principal assets. That is the place where it should properly be tried out. It should not be tried out in a certain place merely because the minority have a lawyer to whom they want to give a good fee. That was what happened in the cases in California, which led to an impeachment case on which the Senate passed. We know the practice there.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I point out the difficulty in many cases of determining those facts? Where a corporation has five different places of business, with offices in each place of business, where is the principal office? Does it happen to be where the president resides? Where is it when the president is in one place and the treasurer in some other? There are all kinds of complications which may arise. It may not be possible to determine where the principal assets are, because they may be scattered in five different places. One cannot tell about that. In that case, we could not tell where the principal office was. Those are the only kinds of cases which would go to the place where the corporation was organized.

Mr. BLACK. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there would be one place which would be known which was not the principal place of business.

Mr. HASTINGS. Where would that be?

Mr. BLACK. That would be the place where the only business on earth they had ever transacted was to organize the corporation and employ an agent who at the same time was the agent of a thousand corporations. We know that that would not be the principal place of business. The State which permits corporations to be organized in that way, in my judgment, should not have jurisdiction of the receivership.

Mr. HASTINGS. The distinguished Senator and I are arguing different points. Of course, his argument is directly at what he believes to be a wrong principle—that of permitting the courts of the State where the company is incorporated to have anything to do with it. I am talking about the practical difficulties of the creditors, the stockholders, or the corporation itself that want to get the job done. The corporation itself probably would have the most to say as to where its principal office was. I doubt whether the statement could be controverted if it said its principal office was at a particular place. To the man outside, however, the corporation might very well say, "This is not our principal office. We have five places of business", or "we have a dozen places of business, and our principal office is in another place." The particular person making the application is defeated in such an instance, because the corporation shows that the place where he has brought his suit is not the proper place to bring it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I am very glad indeed this question has come up, and is being discussed in the Senate. A great many companies are organized in Delaware, as in some other States, not only because the laws are more lenient and the restrictions are less severe, but because, when a case arises they desire to be able to have their case dealt with in the Federal court, and they have adopted the expedient of organizing under the laws of one State, although all of their business is done in another State, in order to defeat the jurisdiction of State courts. It is for that reason that I have been very strongly in favor of the bill presented by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], which would take away the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in certain cases, and I desire here and now to place myself on record individually as being against this amendment.

I do not believe that any State in which the only business engaged in by the corporation is the business of organizing, without the proper safeguards for the stockholders and the people, should be considered as the territorial habitation of the corporation. It is not. It is merely an alighting place to which the corporation comes in order to secure an artificial legal personality, contrary oftentimes to the rules of the various States in which it does business; and where, if the corporation organized in such States, it would be compelled to safeguard the rights of the stockholders and the people.

For these reasons I sincerely hope this amendment will be defeated, and for the further reason that the proper place to administer the estate is where it can be done most expeditiously and most economically.

We have already had entirely too much dissipation of the assets of bankrupt estates; and now we propose to invite the alert lawyer in some State where a company never did a dollar's worth of business in all its existence to begin an action in that State based on the artificial fiction that because the corporation was organized there it lives there, because if we enact this provision we give that State jurisdiction, when, as a matter of fact, it never intended to protect the rights of a single stockholder or a single person dealing with the corporation.

Mr. President, I think that is the vital part of this bill. I sincerely trust the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, in order that the part I am trying to make certain may be left in the measure—namely, that there shall be a place to which those who wish to institute actions may always know they can go—and, at the same time, that the provision which the Senator from Alabama has in mind may be incorporated in the bill, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] suggests to me that, after the word "incorporated", in line 2, page 3, there be inserted the words:

Provided, That the court may, upon petition, direct a transfer of such proceeding to any territorial jurisdiction where the corporation has a substantial portion of its assets, if satisfied that the interests of all parties would be better subserved.

Would the Senator be satisfied with that language?

Mr. BLACK. That would still leave it to the discretion of the court to abandon its jurisdiction; and with the pressure which frequently exists on the part of the members of the bar, as was demonstrated in the hearing which the Senate held with regard to the judge from California, it is my judgment that the provision suggested would not fully protect the rights of the stockholders,

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. When I suggested this change to the Senator from Delaware, I had in mind a situation which arose in the course of an investigation which a special committee of this body made in the States of California and Nevada. We found there a very large corporation incorporated under the laws of the State of Nevada. It had absolutely no assets in that State. It never had any assets in that State. The assets, for the most part, were to be found in the State of California. We found that a petition had been filed in the United States district court where this case was pending, in Carson City, Nev., to transfer the case to the courts in San Francisco. The judge found that he had no authority—at any rate, that was his conclusion—to effect that transfer; that once he had taken jurisdiction of the case in bankruptcy he had not the authority under the law to divest himself of it.

It seemed to me at the time that if that could have been effectuated, the interests of the stockholders would have been much better protected; the representatives of the stockholders could more readily have gone into court to present their view of the problems which arose in the course of the consideration of the bankruptcy, and the entire proceedings would have been much less expensive.

I can see some merit in the provision as it is contained in the bill now before the Senate; but it occurred to me that to obviate the difficulty which arose in this very important case in Nevada, the amendment which the Senator from Delaware suggested a moment ago would be remedial in its effect. I think it would be very effective in carrying out the purposes of the bill.

Mr. BLACK. I fully concur in the Senator's statement that the proposed amendment would be remedial in its effect. I think it would improve the bill as it now stands, with the amendment which has been adopted. I cannot, however, get away from the idea that the place where the affairs of the bankrupt ought to be adjudicated is where the bankrupt actually does business. It seems to me it is the same as though it were provided that an individual who actually lived and did business in Alabama should be compelled, by reason of the fact that he had a distant cousin in Delaware, to have his affairs adjudicated in the courts of Delaware, or the same as requiring an individual in Rhode Island to have his affairs adjudicated in California.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. I think I understand what the Senator has in mind, and I am quite in accord with the purposes he seeks to accomplish; but I find some difficulty in the situation, because unless there is some very definite provision so that proceedings shall be taken in one place, one will be at a loss to determine where the proceedings are to be had. If, now, we eliminate the provision in the bill that the proceedings shall be had in the territorial jurisdiction where the corporation received its charter, where it is incorporated, and provide that the proceedings shall be had in the territorial jurisdiction where it has its principal place of business, we shall, in many instances, have much difficulty in determining where the principal place of business is. That is the difficulty I see.

Mr. BLACK. In order to carry out the idea, why not strike out the amendment which has been suggested and substitute in its place something which would meet the exact situation the Senator has been discussing?

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I cannot hear the Senator because of the confusion in the Chamber.

Mr. BLACK. Why could it not be provided to leave out that amendment and add, after the words "business or", the words "where it has its principal place of business or its principal assets", or substantially that language, and provide also that if it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the court during the time the action is pending that the principal place of business is in some other territory, and the majority desire that the action be removed to the other territory in order to have the affairs of the company administered more economically, the court shall have jurisdiction to do so? In other words, I am interested in having the action brought at the place where, in my judgment, it ought to be brought, where the corporation has the most business, and where the action can be brought most economically.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further, I have no quarrel with him about the idea he has in mind; I think there is much merit in his proposal; but we must fix a determinative place where the proceedings shall start. Unless we do that, we are going to find confusion all along the line, and parties in interest may not know where they can begin their proceedings.

Mr. BLACK. We provide for that in the bill. It is the place where the corporation has had its principal place of business or its principal assets within the preceding 6 months.

Mr. HEBERT. Exactly; but, if the Senator will permit me, where is its principal place of business, where are its principal assets? Those questions must be determined before proceedings can be begun, and that is not so easy. I have in mind some instances where it would be practically impossible to determine that question. My idea is to fix a definite location where proceedings shall be brought, or may be brought, and as to which there can be no question; and thereafter, once proceedings are brought, if it be determined to the satisfaction of the court that there ought to be a change of venue, that can be done by the court.

Mr. BLACK. But if there is any difficulty in the first instance in determining in which territory the action should be brought, why should we, in an attempt to avoid that uncertainty, fly into the very territory which, in my judgment, is the last place in the United States where it ought to find its resting place?

Mr. HEBERT. Solely for the purpose of beginning the proceedings, and, immediately proceedings have been started, if it be shown then to the satisfaction of the court that there should be a change, manifestly the court will take the question under consideration; and if it is for the best interests of the parties concerned the change will be brought about. It is merely to have a definite place where the proceedings may be brought without question, and thereafter proceedings can be undertaken to remedy any situation which may arise with a view of bringing about the best interests of the parties concerned.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is familiar with the inherent human attribute which, unfortunately, is not wholly absent from the courts, always to retain all the possible power that can exist and to exercise it and exert it. I cannot imagine that it would be very easy for the court in Delaware or in any other State, where the bar was ready to obtain the fruit that was expected to fall from the tree, to divest itself of that jurisdiction—not as a rule, at any rate.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further, I know of no advantage that would accrue to citizens of any particular jurisdiction by such a proceeding. A trustee having been appointed continues as trustee wherever he may reside. The instance I have in mind, the outstanding case I have in mind, was one where the judge admitted that the interest of the parties before the court would be better subserved by a transfer of the proceedings to another jurisdiction. He found, in his judgment at any rate, that that could not be done under the bankruptcy law. The purpose of this amendment would be to authorize the bankruptcy court to do that very thing.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think we all agree with the principle for which the Senator from Alabama is contending. I want to ask a question. Let us take the case which the Senator from Alabama suggested a few moments ago, where the stockholders live in the State of Idaho and the corporation has been incorporated in the State of Delaware. If we leave the jurisdiction to be determined upon the question of where the principal assets are, how would the stockholder determine that question? There might be cases where it would be easily determined, because the fact would be notorious, but I can imagine many cases where it would be almost impossible to determine where the principal assets were or where the principal office was.

That for which the Senator is contending is unquestionably correct, that the stockholders ought to be permitted to have the trial at a point nearest to the place where they live or where the principal assets are, but I think there is very much in what the Senator from Rhode Island says as to getting a starting point.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator as to that, but I would suggest——

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry.

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does not the Senator from Alabama discuss this question as if the words "principal place of business" mean the place that is designated in its charter as the principal place of business of the corporation?

Mr. BLACK. No; I do not believe that they refer to the charter. It is my judgment that this proposed legislative act—I may be wrong—refers to where the corporation actually had its principal place of business, and not where ostensibly it had its principal place of business.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then would not we have the same question as that raised by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] with respect to that ground of jurisdiction; that is, the great difficulty and confusion in ascertaining where the most business is done and where the most important business is done? There might be a dozen different tests of that question, so that the creditors would be put into great confusion and difficulty in ascertaining the proper jurisdiction.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I recall, in my experience, that one of the methods adopted by corporations with reference to these matters is to test the question of jurisdiction where there is an uncertainty about it. That is half their battle. I should like to see the principle advocated by the Senator from Alabama incorporated in the bill if we can with certainty provide a starting point.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with the Senator that in ordinary instances corporations seek to evade jurisdiction, but in this instance, they, in the main, will be seeking to support jurisdiction, because it is mainly for the benefit of the corporations themselves.

Mr. BORAH. That is true, but let us assume that we leave this bill so that the party desiring to bring action must determine where the principal place of business is or must determine where the principal assets are; then that will give the corporation a great advantage in fighting the question of jurisdiction, because the knowledge of these facts is completely within its possession.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator why we should not insert some amendment in line with what I said a few moments ago—because I judge the Senator agrees with the viewpoint I have—simply to provide, if there is any question raised, that the court shall automatically send it to such other Federal court as may have jurisdiction of the matter?

Mr. BORAH. I would be willing to see a provision making it incumbent upon the court to transfer upon certain conditions being shown.

Mr. BLACK. But the point of what I want to do is to provide for a transfer, as suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, from a court where it is originally filed as the principal place of business rather than to provide for the transfer from the court which only has territorial jurisdiction. I think we can very easily draw an amendment which will be satisfactory to all of us.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to interrupt the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NORRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BLACK. I yield first to my colleague.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, as I understand the section now under consideration, the petition is filed by the corporation itself, and if that be true, of course, the corporation knows where its principal place of business is, and there would be no confusion or uncertainty on that point, and no controversy such as suggested by the Senator from Idaho on the subject of jurisdiction.

Mr. BORAH. If the corporation has the sole power to select jurisdiction, all this debate is perfectly useless.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It will be noted that section 79, on page 2, provides that any corporation which could become a bankrupt under section 4, and so forth, may file a petition.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; undoubtedly.

Mr. BLACK. What I want to prevent is letting them have the power to determine that.

Mr. BORAH. The corporation may do so, but suppose somebody else desires to bring it into bankruptcy proceedings?

Mr. BLACK. I object to bringing the action in a State where it does not do business.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. BLACK. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. I appreciate what the Senator seeks to accomplish, but I want to say once again that it is very important that we should have a definite place for the proceedings to begin. Once that has been established, if the Senator wants to provide arbitrarily that a change shall be made upon a showing that the principal place of business is elsewhere, I would have no objection. It is broader as the bill is now worded, but we must have some definite place where proceedings are to be had in the first instance, and thereafter proceedings may be had to determine where the principal place of the concern is and have the action transferred there. If the Senator would suggest that it shall be obligatory upon the court to make such a transfer, personally, I would have no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the question further.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, because I am trying to meet the Senator's objection, I was about to suggest instead of beginning with the word "assets" on page 3, and before the committee amendment at that point, we write in something like this:

> Or if the principal place of business or the place where the principal assets are located is in doubt, then in the territorial jurisdiction in which the company was incorporated.

What objection could there possibly be to that? It certainly would make plain the determination of Congress and what it is intended to do.

Mr. BLACK. Doubt in whose mind?

Mr. HASTINGS. If the person bringing it has a doubt, and it can be shown that that doubt is wholly unfounded, and that the place of business of the corporation or the place of the principal assets of the corporation was well known to the person who made the application in the first place, then he would not be permitted to begin the proceedings in the place where the company was incorporated. But if the whole matter is in doubt, if the company is in doubt, if the stockholders and the creditors and everyone else be in doubt, then they might certainly have some place to go. There cannot be any possibility of complaint about this provision along the line of the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. BLACK. May I say that, of course, if they were anxious to get the matter into one particular territory, they would immediately claim to be in doubt?

Mr. HASTINGS. The company never could be in doubt. The company could not say it was in doubt. It ought to be able to say for itself where it was.

Mr. BLACK. I agree; and therefore it should be able to say where its principal place of business is, and there is where the case should be tried.

Mr. HASTINGS. But there will be some other people saying that what the company says is not true. Let me read this again:

But if the principal place of business or the place where the principal assets are located is in doubt, then in the territorial jurisdiction in which it was incorporated.

Mr. BORAH. Instead of saying "is in doubt", would it not be better to say "is controverted"?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; that would be better, I will make that change.

Mr. BLACK. That will be perfectly satisfactory to me, if the Senator will also add at the end of the amendment the clause which was originally suggested. I think that would make the matter entirely satisfactory.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then, after the word "assets", on page 3, line 1, I move to insert the following:

Or if the principal place of business or the place where the principal assets are located is controverted, then in the territorial jurisdiction in which it was incorporated: Provided, That the court may, upon petition, direct a transfer of such proceedings to any territorial jurisdiction where the corporation has a substantial portion of its assets, if satisfied that the interests of all parties would be better subserved.

Mr. BLACK. I think that would be all right. I think what all of us want is to substitute the word "shall" for the word "may", so it is predicated upon his reaching a conclusion that it is to the interest of the company and of the parties at interest. Let it read that the court "shall" instead of "may."

Mr. HASTINGS. Very well. I send to the desk an amendment to be added after the word "assets", on page 3, line 1.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 1, after the word "assets", it is proposed to insert:

Or if the principal place of business or the place where the principal assets are located is controverted, then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Now I move, on page 3, line 1, to strike out the word "or" after the word "assets."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 1, after the word "assets", it is proposed to strike out the word "or."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. I offer a further amendment to the committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 2, after the word "incorporated", it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the court shall, upon petition, direct the transfer of such proceeding to any territorial jurisdiction where the corporation has a substantial portion of its assets, if satisfied that the interests of all parties would be better subserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 31, section 4, line 19, after the word "adjudication", it is proposed to insert the following:

The amount of any damages, as evidenced by a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, in any action for negligence instituted prior to adjudication of defendant in such action in bankruptcy and pending at the time of the filing of petition in bankruptcy, whether voluntary or involuntary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the amendment has the effect of providing an additional provable claim. In a case of negligence where suit was entered prior to the petition in bankruptcy, the claim may be proved if a judgment shall have been had for damages. The Senator in charge of the bill has stated his willingness to accept the amendment.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, it is perfectly satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on behalf of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the proper place in the bill insert a new section as follows:

That the first sentence of subsection (a) of section 75 of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Within 30 days after the enactment of this act every court of bankruptcy of which the jurisdiction or territory includes a county or counties having an agricultural population (according to the last available United States census) of 500 or more farmers shall appoint one or more referees to be known as 'conciliation commissioners', one such conciliation commissioner to be appointed for each county having an agricultural population of 500 or more farmers according to said census: Provided further, That where any county in any such district contains a smaller number of farmers according to said census, for the purposes of this paragraph such county shall be included with one or more adjacent counties where the population of the counties so combined includes 500 or more farmers according to said census."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to provide conciliation commissioners in agricultural counties, so that the work of conciliation may be more actively carried on than it now is under the bill passed at the special session.

Senators who are familiar with that act will remember that section 75 provides—

Courts of bankruptcy are authorized, upon petition of at least 15 farmers within any county who certify that they intend to file petitions under this section, to appoint for such county one or more referees to be known as "conciliation commissioners."

In practice, farmers have proved to be reluctant to sign such petitions, under the misapprehension that they would be adjudged bankrupt and thus would have some obloquy heaped upon them as a result of their action. I am informed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] that he has taken up this matter with the Farm Credit Administration, and that they are friendly to this amendment, because they believe it would be very effective in carrying out the obvious intent of Congress when it passed the bill at the last session.

Under date of April 30, 1934, Governor Myers wrote to the junior Senator from Iowa, and I desire to quote briefly a sentence from that letter:

I hope that Congress will pass the amendment to the bankruptcy act, which will make the appointment of conciliation commissioners more easy.

It is quite obvious that it was the intent of Congress to provide this means of permitting farmers to secure such assistance and benefits as could be derived from the appointment of commissioners of this kind; but, as previously stated, it has proved in practice that in many instances farmers are reluctant to sign the petitions. If this amendment were to prevail, it is the theory of the amendment—and the view is endorsed by the Farm Credit governor—that a great deal would be accomplished on behalf of farmers who find themselves in distress at this time.

I sincerely hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. As I listened to the reading of the amendment, it provides that any county where more than 500 farmers reside shall be supplied with a conciliation commissioner. That would be true in a county having a population of 100,000, most of whom are engaged in industry, provided there were 500 farmers living in that county; as I listened to the reading of the amendment. I desire to be sure that I am correct about that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is correct. The amendment provides that—

> Every court of bankruptcy of which the jurisdiction or territory includes a county or counties having an agricultural population (according to the last available United States census) of 500 or more farmers shall appoint one or more referees—

And so forth.

The Senator has correctly interpreted the purpose of the amendment; but the Senator, no doubt being very familiar with the act, knows that these commissioners do not receive any compensation unless the cases which they have under their jurisdiction are docketed. Therefore, there would be no expenditures, no outlay of any money, unless their services proved to be effective.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, that is one question I had in mind—how we were going to compensate the conciliation commissioners.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I refer the Senator to paragraph (b), section 75, which provides that—

> Upon filing of any petition by a farmer under this section there shall be paid a fee of $10 to be transmitted to the clerk of the court and covered into the Treasury. The conciliation commissioner shall receive as compensation for his services, including all expenses, a fee of $10 for each case docketed and submitted to him, to be paid out of the Treasury.

In other words, these commissioners are not under any regular salary. They receive their compensation only in cases which are actually docketed and which actually are conciliated under their direction.

Mr. HEBERT. As I understand, the purpose of this amendment is to provide for conciliation commissioners to whom proceedings in bankruptcy filed in court would be referred for conciliation and adjustment without declaring the debtor to be a bankrupt. In cases which are referred to the conciliation commissioner the fees, which are to be paid first to the court and then to the conciliation commissioner, must be paid by the petitioner.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct.

Mr. HEBERT. And the conciliation commissioner receives no fee unless and until a petition has been referred to him and he has taken cognizance of it and has proceeded to function.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is correct about that. There will be no outlay of money and no cost to the Treasury or any other governmental agency so far as these commissioners are concerned.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Some time ago a person who had been acting as such a commissioner, I think either in North Carolina or in South Carolina, came to me—I think he was sent to me by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]—and showed me how impossible it was to get this work done for the $10 provided by the law. I heard him explain the matter thoroughly, and had in mind offering an amendment which would increase the amount; but, to be perfectly frank, I have been so engaged with other provisions of the law that I had overlooked it until the Senator offered his amendment. I wonder if he has considered the matter, and whether he can suggest some amendment to deal with it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, that would require the amendment of another section, section (b) on page 62, as the Senator will see if he has before him the pamphlet containing the bankruptcy laws of the United States.

Mr. HASTINGS. I was wondering whether the Senator had given any consideration to that phase of the subject, and whether he knew any person who had any experience with it. I am quite certain it will be necessary, in order for this part of the act to be successful, to increase the amount; and I was hoping the Senator would suggest another amendment which would increase the amount to at least $25. That is my recollection of the amount that would be necessary—not to exceed $25, instead of $10.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Iowa informs me that he has not given particular attention to the situation insofar as the amount of the fee is concerned, but that he does not object to the fee being reasonably increased. Furthermore, he has in mind that perhaps some other expenses which are not now permitted to be charged ought to be included, such as postage and telephone expenses.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, that matter has already been taken care of. Page 33 of the House measure gives free postage to conciliators.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am glad to have the Senator from Indiana give us that information. I will state to the Senator from Delaware that the Senator from Iowa informs me that if this amendment shall be agreed to he will be glad to support an amendment to increase the fee to some reasonable amount.

Mr. HASTINGS. I hope the Senator from Iowa will prepare and suggest an amendment and let it go to conference, and then let the conferees decide the amount that ought to be put in. I have some figures on the subject which I should like to submit to the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on behalf of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to paragraph (b) of section 75 of the bankruptcy law, changing the fee to be paid from not to exceed $10 to not to exceed $25.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator send his amendment to the desk, so that it may be stated? The Chair suggests to the Senator from Delaware that he indicate where he desires to have the amendment made.

Mr. HASTINGS. On page 33, in section 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On what line?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] is absent because of illness. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] are necessarily detained. I ask that these announcements stand in the RECORD for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

The Senator from Delaware proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add the following new section at the proper place:

Amend section 75 (b) in the act of July 1, 1898, as amended and supplemented, by striking out the figures "$10" wherever it appears therein and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$25."

TAXATION OF LIQUOR

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the most effective argument adduced in favor of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment was the presence in the United States, as it was claimed, of a vast amount of illicit liquor. It was contended that the bootlegger was poisoning the youth of the country with bad liquor, and there is no doubt but that that argument had a very tremendous effect with the people generally throughout the United States. It was contended that through the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and the restoration of what was called "legal liquor", illegal or illicit liquor could be banished from the land, at least to a marked degree. The repeal fight turned very largely on the assurance of those advocating repeal that repeal would mean the end of this illegal traffic in liquor. We were warned that failure to repeal would be to aggravate the fearful conditions then said to prevail.

It now appears that the repeal of the eighteenth amendment has had practically no effect as to the heavy distribution of illicit liquor throughout the United States, or in discouraging the activities of the bootlegger. Indeed, it would seem, from some statements which have been made of late, that the extent of bootlegging is even greater than it was during pre-repeal days.

It will be recalled that not only was this argument used to bring about repeal, but when we came to consider the question of a tax upon beer, again the bootlegger appeared, in all his confidence and strength, and really dictated the amount of tax which should be imposed. He spoke not in person, but by the voice of those who were going to sell legal beer.

We were advised that with a higher tax than that which was proposed, bootlegging, or the illicit sale of liquor, would increase, therefore the tax was fixed at a figure which, it was said, would encourage the sale of legal liquor and discourage the sale of illegal liquor. It did nothing of the kind.

Mr. Joseph H. Choate, Jr., who is the Federal Alcohol Control Administrator, administering the code with reference to intoxicating liquors, a few nights ago delivered a very remarkable address upon this subject. He began his statement by saying:

As concerns liquor, the United States is living in a fool's paradise. We know that prohibition's Frankenstein monster, the bootleg trade, is still with us, but we refuse to see its size and power or to recognize what it has done to us. Particularly are we blind to the enormous growth of the main body of the monster, illicit distilling, compared to which smuggling and industrial alcohol diversion have been mere trifling excrescences on its gigantic frame.

If I construe correctly that language it is to the effect that bootlegging and the sale of illicit liquor have in nowise diminished; that, rather, has there been an increase of the trade, and that it is now increasing at a rapid stride, and the country is flooded with bad, illicit liquor. A sad situation. When I read Mr. Choate's statement and recall the debate on repeal, I am amazed—not at Mr. Choate's statement, but at the prophetic powers of some of my colleagues.

There was a time in the history of the world when prophets were slain if they prophesied falsely. There would certainly be a great massacre in this country at this time if we should deal in that way with those who prophesied as to what would be the result coming from the repeal of the eighteenth amendment.

Again Mr. Choate says:

We now have facts from which the reasonable inference is that these estimates are far below the truth, that bootleg production continues on so huge a scale as to constrain us to the conclusion that our people must now be consuming greater quantities of spirits than they did in pre-prohibition days, and that, while the legal industry has, and is using to its utmost extent, capacity enough to supply the pre-prohibition demand, the illegal industry has, and is using, a greater capacity, the product of which the public is presumably buying and consuming.

Even more interesting than the statement is the remedy which is proposed by Mr. Choate. Again, the bootlegger is called in to be the dictator as to what our law shall be with reference to the taxing of liquor. We are now asked, Mr. President, after the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, after the fixing of the tax upon beer to suit that situation, to again readjust the taxing power of the United States to accommodate those who are contesting, as it is claimed, with the sale of illicit liquor. And, Mr. President, this remedy will be no more effective against the bootlegger than those heretofore proposed.

Before we commit ourselves to revising the taxes upon liquor or reducing the taxes upon liquor, let us know something about the profits which are being made by those who are now engaged in the sale of what is called "legal liquor"—who are in the legitimate business of selling liquor. If Mr. Choate will place beside his request, that we lower the taxes, a statement as to the profits which are now being realized and enjoyed by those who are selling legal liquor, he will find that the trouble is not with the taxes but with the huge, enormous, unconscionable profits which are realized by those who are selling liquor—in other words, in the prices, which are out of all reason.

The remedy does not consist in providing lower taxes. The lowering of taxes in the United States will result in a greater income and greater profit to those who are selling liquor. But the remedy lies in the hands of Mr. Choate himself—that is, under the code, to see that the prices are established in accordance with reasonable demand and to see that those who keep dives and brothels are not permitted to continue in the business.

If that were established, Mr. President, if the bootlegger can be dealt with at all, it would be far more effective than the proposed remedy of reducing taxes, because, judging the future by the past, the only result from the reduction of taxes would be an increase in the profits of those who are engaged in the liquor business.

I have had some figures furnished me within the last few days which are, to me, rather surprising. I do not at this time insert them in the RECORD, because they have not been confirmed, as it were, or made with that authenticity behind them which I should like to have before I put them into the RECORD. But the figures convince me that the one profitable industry in the United States today is the liquor business. The men who are asking for relief—lighter taxes—like the munitions makers of the world, are engaged in the one industry which is making profits in the United States. Nevertheless, they are in the name of the bootlegger and of illicit liquor asking that the Government take its taxes off or reduce the taxes.

Mr. Choate further says:

The means to this end should include the following obvious steps: First, there should be greatly increased appropriations for enforcement.

How familiar. What attacks were made upon those who advocated increased appropriations for the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment? That was all to be saved to the Government as soon as the eighteenth amendment was repealed. These enforcement charges were to disappear. The taxpayers were to be relieved. As I hark back to that debate, I hear again—no bootleggers, no illicit liquor, no more enforcement expenses, no overtaxed people in the interest of prohibition, no saloons, no speak-easies, but temperance and diminution of crime. I get no pleasure out of the situation, but I think it fair to recall these prophecies that we may not be misled farther by such pleas as reduced taxes as a remedy for bootlegging.

Second, a campaign should be started and maintained by every organization interested in temperance, including all honest drys and repealists, to arouse public opinion and compel the aid of every police and prosecuting authority, local and State as well as Federal, to press for efficient and drastic action.

All will agree with that. That is sound.

Third, there should be immediate adoption of every reasonable means of cheapening and improving the legal product, and to induce all decent citizens to withdraw support from the bootlegger.

A campaign of persuasive arguments is to be carried on seeking to induce the good people not to buy bootleggers' liquor. I have no objection to that program. I make no prediction as to the results.

Fourth, there should be such reduction in taxes and import duties as will enable the legal producers and importers to compete.

Mr. President, I venture to say upon the facts which I have acquired, the figures which are in my possession, that at the present time the people who are engaged in the sale of what they call "legal liquor" are reaping a profit far in excess of what would be called a "reasonable" profit upon any kind of business. Let us consider that before we reduce taxes.

There is another phase to this matter, Mr. President. One of the great arguments in the campaign against the eighteenth amendment was that the bootlegger and the speak-easy were to be done away with, and the saloon was not to be permitted to come back.

Much worse than the saloon has returned and is here, apparently, to stay. I say worse than the saloon. It is worse. It is a legalized dive, a protected rendezvous of crime.

So far as the enforcement of the code is concerned, so far as the supervision of the liquor traffic is concerned, there seems to be no effort to prevent the kind of drinking places which are maintained in this country in a very marked degree in all the large cities of the United States.

I read from a newspaper, one of the three leading newspapers in a large city, which says, giving an account of these transactions:

In these places—

Where this liquor is being sold—children were being served drinks without question, children were serving and mixing the drinks, and the children were the entertainers for those who were drinking. The sight was revolting.

This is not an exceptional scene. It is common night after night, week after week. The old saloon was not so degraded. Here they are brotheling and degrading children for gain, for profits. Take taxes off of that sordid business!

Some of this, Mr. President, I do not care to put into the RECORD. It is revolting. It would shame a brothel. In one place it says:

A blond child of about 16 is dancing for the crowd at the bar. Her skirts are to her hips. She is very drunk. The crowd cheers her. She kicks higher and higher. Suddenly her foot slips and she falls on her back in a pool of beer on the floor. The crowd roars with laughter.

That, Mr. President, is going on openly, notoriously, night after night under the permission—I will say under the authority of law, and under the very eye of those who have to do with the enforcement of the liquor code.

The way the liquor code is being enforced in the United States at this time, and considering the sordid hands into which business has been placed, is protecting the most heinous form of crime and immorality that could possibly be conceived. And before we talk about lowering taxes upon those who are undermining and destroying the youth, the childhood of the country, let us know whether they are fit to operate those kind of institutions at all.

There is much more of this, Mr. President. Some of it, as I said, I do not care to put into the RECORD. A long record in different cities is in my files, sent to me by those deeply concerned over the trend of affairs touching the liquor traffic.

Before and during the days we were putting American boys in camps preparing them for war, the liquor traffic followed them to camp. Now the liquor traffic follows the C.W.A. camps and seeks the favors and the money of the boys whom the Government is seeking to start in a better life. I read from a paper published in New Rochelle, N.Y.:

(By Theodore B. Goetz)

WHITE PLAINS, December 18.—More than 100 C.W.A. pay checks were cashed on Saturday in one White Plains liquor store alone by reemployed jobless men who carried away bottles of the cheapest brand of "cut" rye whisky.

Similar conditions existed in some other liquor stores in the county, investigation disclosed today, where "relief" money aggregating several thousand dollars was spent by the "needy" for liquor.

Mr. President, we never can cure bootlegging by reducing taxes. In Canada, where they have governmental control, the bootlegging problem is almost as serious, if not quite as serious, as it now is in the United States, or that it has been at any time.

For myself, so long as the law is administered as it is at this time, I should be in favor of increasing the amount of taxes rather than decreasing them. I think when we give people an opportunity to prey upon a community, to destroy its womanhood and its manhood, its youth, its young girls and young boys, that the price ought to be pretty high. I think they ought to pay the Government of the United States a very large stipend for that permission. If we are going to permit this to be offered to the youth of the land, at least let us not sell the privilege too cheaply. I ask Mr. Choate, therefore, when he submits his proposition for decreasing the taxes, to submit a report as to how the liquor traffic is being carried on at the present time and what are the profits of those engaged in that traffic.

NOTES ON OPEN DOOR IN CHINA

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I do not desire to advert to the interesting subject so splendidly dealt with by the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and as to which I have reason to know will be touched on in some form by the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and possibly further illumined by the distinguished leader of a great cause, the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. I wish to allude to a feature apart from that, and to occupy but a moment or two as a point of duty to ourselves. When I use the word "ourselves" I mean the Senate and the Senators.

Mr. President, the public press informs us that the Secretary of State has sent the expression of a commanding sentiment to the Empire of Japan, speaking in behalf of the Government of the United States. The record discloses a statement previously announced in Japan by the official spokesman of that Imperial Government to the effect that the privilege heretofore existing in behalf of the United States of enjoying the trade of China and continuing China upon the basis of a country open to all privileges of civilization would be more or less restricted, as asserted by the spokesman of Japan. It is announced that Japan reserves the right to sit in guardianship and control by direction of whatever should be the course of government or the enjoyment of privileges as to China, the latter word "privileges" used by this eminent diplomat referring to the privileges of trade specifically.

Mr. President, the Secretary of State for the United States of America, speaking for the administration, and I am sure for the Government at large, responds that the treaties existing between our country and Japan and other countries that have collaborated assure by promise an open door in China. That this means a door not closed against any nation or its people who have a natural and moral right to trade on equal terms and to deal upon an equitable basis with the people of China. The Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, announces that it is the policy of the United States to insist on the treaty being complied with, and the announcement is that the United States will not accept the suggestion that the open door is to swing open only just so far as Japan will consent.

To the contrary, as we are executing our part in the treaty in fulfillment of its terms, we demand that the treaty shall be complied with in the fullness of its terms without limitation placed upon it by Japan or by any other country assuming the superior function of sitting in supervision of other countries, particularly to United States of America.

Mr. President, I am very anxious that it be observed that the United States Senate, which is something of a coadjuting body with the Secretary of State and the President in matters of international relations, wholly approve the action of the Secretary of State. I rise to present the thought so that it may be perfectly apparent that in matters between ourselves and Japan or between ourselves and any foreign country, as announced by the Secretary of State, touching the enforcement of the rights of America, has the approval of all the Congress, but particularly that there is no voice in the United States Senate which disapproves by criticism or dissent the declaration of the Secretary of State.

In addition to this, sir, I assume to suggest to this honorable body that our attitude be understood as one which approves the declarations of the Secretary of State and approves them unanimously. Second, sir, that we approve the attitude of the President and put behind him the united Congress of the United States. We would have Japan or any other country understand that these declarations of the Secretary of State are the declarations of America, not of any political party, and that they are the declarations of America as affirmed by the eminent representatives in this body of any State and all States; that no one of official government has at any time dissented, and now, on this morning, as immediately following the declaration of the Secretary of State, gives to the action its unanimous approval.

Mr. President, I am moved to make these observations this morning by matters that have come to this Government and possibly are wholly in the possession of this honorable body equally as in the possession of the State Department. These disclosures indicate that there is considerable confusion in certain governments of the world as to whether the United States meant what it said—that it would enforce its right under the treaty in the legitimate manner provided by civilized nations, or whether it was a mere gesture from which we are to separate or wholly ignore at any time it may appear that the demonstration on our part does not meet the approval of some other country of the earth.

Mr. President, it is announced that England asserts, through Sir John Simon, the official representative of her state foreign affairs department, that the attitude announced by Japan is "satisfactory to England." The attitude of any country, but particularly Japan, may be satisfactory to England, but merely because it is satisfactory to England is in no wise any proof, certainly it is in no wise conclusive, that it is satisfactory to the United States of America.

It is a most noticeable thing, and one that ought not to escape us, that England's early announcement immediately after the statement of Japan, following within an hour, that the attitude of Japan was "satisfactory to England", is a mere declaration that the new treaty arrangement between Japan and England is sustained, in that particular direction as a special favor, and is satisfactory to England; but it must not be forgotten that a short while ago England gave the world to understand that she had withdrawn certain special treaties which existed and which had something of a mutual beneficial interest between herself and Japan. Since then, sir, I assert on this floor, there has been another arrangement effected between England and Japan, which was the right of England and the privilege of Japan, but which has not been made public, wherein Japan agrees to a form of service and benefit to England respecting trade and trade privileges that is not accorded to other countries, particularly it is not expressed in behalf of the United States.

Mr. President, if it is the purpose of Japan to begin the policy of granting privileges only to certain lands which shall be selected in turn for something specifically advanced to her, that is her privilege, but America would like to know the facts. We would like to know if it is to be hereafter understood that the United States is to be treated as secondary to England, and that the previous special privileges which were granted under the previous treaty to England, which the world was informed had been abrogated, are really being renewed in spirit and in return for favors received or to be received and specifically in discrimination against the United States.

Mr. President, we have just legislated a measure that looks to what is called the "freedom of the Philippines"; but we have reserved for some length of time something of a control of certain interests in the Philippines and something giving that country some claim upon our beneficence or our guardianship. If Japan shall take the course that assumes to herself the control of open door of China, opening or closing it within such limitations and on such hinges as she herself feels to be satisfactory to Japan, then, sir, her next step, now that we have announced that the Philippines are not to be a part of the United States, either as territory or province, will naturally be to promptly take charge of the open door of the Philippines and limit the doorway and the gateway, water and land, of the Philippines to the United States. This pretension on the ground that Japan exerts such privilege as the guardian of Asia, Mr. President, may I make bold to quote myself as I stood on this floor almost a year past—prophesying that a move was afoot to create a Monroe doctrine for Asia, and that Japan would assume that role to Asia, guiding or controlling it under the theory of protecting herself, and something of a control of Asiatic lands after the order that we have been essaying as to ourselves in South and Central America. Lately we have seen that expression, which I had indulged on this floor, verified by an open assertion on the part of Japan—a doctrine of Asia for the Asiatic under control of Japan.

Mr. President, we cannot remain silent and allow the world to assume that we are hesitating whether we approve the action of the Secretary of State and the declaration of our Government. There must be no time between the action and the declaration and the affirmance of it by this body. There must be immediate haste, immediate declaration, that all the countries of the world may see that this is a united country behind the Secretary of State or the President in the declaration of a foreign policy which seeks to guide the rights of America.

Mr. President, if that be not so we would, by our silence or apparent indifference, invite other lands to begin their policy of discrimination adverse to us upon the theory that, as the President is now about to tender certain treaties for the purpose of securing trade to our land in turn for trade we may secure with other countries, it will be assumed that as we are being initially ejected from equal privileges with Japan in the matter of trade; other countries should take the license that as we do not announce ourselves specifically as having the right under treaty they will be equally anxious and equally active in limiting our enjoyment as between themselves and ourselves in their sphere.

Mr. President, we are either America as a nation or we are a discordant, dissatisfied, distracted people. If we are the latter, as between ourselves and foreign governments, we do not deserve a just treatment. If we are too weak, we are to be pitied. If we are too cowardly, we are to be condemned. We want no conflict, we will have none, of a military or personal nature. But the way to avoid any conflict is promptly to assert our rights, let them be seen with specific direction, and, standing upon those rights, put them before the world on the truth on which they are based, and then inform the world that, standing on our rights as a people of independence, we announce the rights, we submit them upon the holy cause of justice, and then, sir, whenever necessary, as true Americans under a Christian generation, we enforce them in a legitimate manner.

Mr. President, I therefore have invaded for a moment the important discussion of my able friend from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and those who shall follow him, that I should be one of those in this honorable body quickly to announce to the world, so far as it listens to any voice from this honorable tribunal, that America is with the Secretary of State, that it wholly affirms the declaration he has uttered. It stands behind the President not as a party but as a Nation. It upholds the theory that a treaty is a sacred contract. We say to all the world we have had a very sad lesson touching treaties that have been resolved here and there into what are called "scraps of paper." America is not ready to have that particular tragedy duplicated. The way to avoid any attempt to have it repeated is to make very early announcement of the strength of the land, both of the purpose and capacity, to enforce its legal rights and to enjoy the full fruits of it, while it grants full legal rights and justice to all other lands.

Mr. President, I thank you, sir, and the Senators for letting me trespass for this moment on the discussion of domestic but important matters, but I regard it as more important that at every time it is necessary or justified America shall assert her position that she is America and all her Americans are behind her; that our creed of duty and action is that, as to matters at home, divide as we may, but in defense of opposition from abroad, united we stand.

CONDITIONS UNDER PROHIBITION REPEAL

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have listened with very special interest to what the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has stated about conditions in various parts of the country resulting from repeal of the eighteenth amendment. It may be that in future years his utterances will be referred to as the first public voice raised in a new movement for another national prohibition amendment. Such a movement will be unfortunate. While not agreeing with all the Senator said, I must admit that, unfortunately, conditions in some parts of the country are not satisfactory.

As one of those who urged the repeal of the eighteenth amendment on the ground that it would promote temperance, I have been disappointed in the manner of the laxity with which some of the States are administering the law and with the liberality with which they have enacted measures for the sale of intoxicating liquor. In some instances the laws are more liberal than in the pre-prohibition days.

When the District of Columbia liquor bill was before the Senate I offered an amendment forbidding the sale of liquors other than wines and beer in the District of Columbia on Sunday. The amendment was adopted by this body and now is a part of the law. I did it because I felt that we who urged the repeal of the eighteenth amendment have a solemn obligation to have this new experiment in the sale of intoxicating liquors administered in every possible way that may tend to promote temperance. We must prevent a swing from one extreme to another.

There are in parts of the country some conditions which did not exist under the old system. The sale of hard liquors on Sunday has been legalized, I am sorry to say, in some States, when it was not for sale under the old system. I want to warn those who are opposed to national prohibition that the religious people of the country will not tolerate saloons open on Sunday and intoxicating liquor sold on Sunday. They do not intend to permit people reeling through the streets in an intoxicated condition in the face of the churchgoing people of the country. That condition, unfortunately, is reported to exist in some sections of the country. Let us hope this condition and that referred to by the Senator from Idaho are isolated.

Furthermore, it is not in the interest of temperance to sell hard liquors at 2 or 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning. That is in the interest of promoting and encouraging intoxication, and not temperance. I do not think objectionable conditions are general, but they do exist in certain parts of the country. It is regrettable, because just as sure as we are here today, if we return to the old saloon conditions and the evils of the old saloon, there will be a movement in the country for national prohibition. The people of the country did not vote to substitute worse evils for the intolerable conditions under national prohibition.

I think it behooves all of us who urged the repeal of national prohibition in order to promote temperance to see that laws are enacted in the several States and in the District of Columbia which really look in the direction of promoting temperance, and make it possible for people during legitimate hours to purchase pure intoxicating liquors at a reasonable price for beverage purposes if they see fit.

Mr. President, I hope what the Senator from Idaho has said and what I have said as one known to be interested in what may be termed the "wet" cause will result in awakening a realization in this country that the people are not going to stand and tolerate a return to old conditions, and that merely eliminating the word "saloon" and substituting something else that is worse than the saloon is not going to deceive and mislead people. Indeed, the saloon properly regulated was not the evil that unregulated and uncontrolled licensed places may become.

I thereupon call upon our people who were opposed to national prohibition, who favored a liberal course in this country in the enactment and administration of liquor laws, to see to it that this business is controlled by laws and regulations that will make for respectability; that the legalized institutions selling liquor are law-abiding, clean, and wholesome to the end that we may preserve the personal liberty and the rights of States for which we fought; but we cannot and will not do it unless the several States and officials and the leaders in this movement see that the laws are administered in the interest of temperance, and not intemperance. It is also the duty of the Federal and State Governments to protect those who pay excise taxes and operating taxes to suppress bootlegging and its attendant evils.

I am pleased that the Senator from Idaho has spoken on this subject, because his speech may be a warning which I hope will be heeded.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I do not desire to comment at length upon the liquor situation at this time. I merely desire to say that the facts presented and discussed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] make it evident that the restoration of the powers embodied in the eighteenth amendment, at least to some effective degree, is becoming more and more essential; a restoration, if not at present to the unqualified and inflexible extent originally carried in that amendment, at least to such an extent as will place the Nation in position to reduce to the lowest possible minimum the debaucheries and the dangers of this traffic; an inherently lawless traffic.

I think it is being realized by both wets and drys that the liquor traffic is too big, too lawless, too powerful, too remorseless for the States alone to handle it successfully. In my judgment, the only way successfully to handle it is to put it under an eternal and unchangeable legal and constitutional ban, and continuously to endeavor to destroy it. I believe, however, it will be realized by all alike that a restoration to the National Government of sufficient power to deal with the situation, to cooperate effectively with the States in controlling the liquor traffic, is becoming more and more necessary.

CORPORATE REORGANIZATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS]. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "ayes" seem to have it. The "ayes" have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, did the Chair announce that the amendment was adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announced that the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, at the proper place in the bill, to insert the following, to be known as section 10:

Section 75 of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", as amended, is amended by adding thereto a new subsection "s" to read as follows:

"(s) (1) Any farmer failing to obtain the acceptance of a majority in number and amount of all creditors whose claims are affected by a composition or extension proposal may amend his petition or answer asking to be adjudged a bankrupt. Said farmer may at the time of the first hearing petition the court that all of his property, whether pledged, encumbered, or unencumbered by liens or otherwise, be appraised at its then actual value and that his homestead and exemptions be set aside and that he be allowed to retain possession of any part or parcel or all of the remainder of his property and pay for same under the terms and conditions set forth in this act.

"(2) Upon such a request being made in the petition or answer, or at the time of the first hearing, appraisers shall be designated and appointed. Such appraisers shall appraise all the property of the debtor at its then reasonable actual value. The words 'actual value' shall not necessarily imply cash value but shall imply the reasonable and fair value of the property at the time the appraisal is made. Such appraisers shall be designated and appointed, and their appraisals shall be made in all other respects, with right of objections, exceptions, and appeal, in accordance with this act: Provided, That in case of real estate either party may file objections, exceptions, and appeals within 2 years from date of order approving the appraisal.

"(3) After the value of the debtor's property shall have been fixed by the appraisal as herein provided, the referee shall issue an order setting aside to such debtor his homestead and exemptions, and shall further order that the possession, under the control of the court, of any part or parcel or all of the remainder of the debtor's property, shall remain in the debtor subject to a general lien, as security for the payment of the value thereof to the trustee of the creditors, if a trustee is appointed, such a lien to be subject to and inferior to all prior liens, pledges, or encumbrances. Such prior liens, pledges, or encumbrances shall remain in full force and effect, and the property covered by such prior liens, pledges, or encumbrances shall be subject to the payment of the claims of the secured creditors holding such prior liens, pledges, or encumbrances up to the actual value of such property as fixed by the appraisal provided for herein. All liens herein on livestock shall cover all increase, and all liens on real property shall cover all rental received or crops grown thereon by the debtor, as security for the payment of any sum that may be due or past due under the terms and provisions of the next paragraph, until the full value of any such particular property has been paid.

"(4) At the time of the order setting aside to the debtor his homestead and exemptions, and giving him possession, under the control of the court, of any part, parcel, or all of the remainder of his property, whether pledged or covered by any prior lien or encumbrance, the debtor shall agree and bind himself that he will pay to the secured creditors, as their interests may appear, and to the trustee of the unsecured creditors, as his interests may appear, if a trustee is appointed, the value of the property as fixed by the appraisal, together with interest at the rate of 1 percent per annum on the following terms: 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 6 months from date of agreement; 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 12 months; 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 18 months; 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 24 months, and that thereafter he will pay 5 percent principal, together with interest semiannually for the following 4 years and will pay the balance on or before 6 months after the last semiannual payment has been made to the secured creditors, as their interests may appear, and to the trustee of the unsecured creditors, as his interests may appear, if a trustee is appointed.

"(5) The debtor may consume or dispose of any part or parcel or all of said property, whether covered by the general lien to the trustee, if a trustee is appointed, or subject to pledges or prior liens or encumbrances held by secured creditors, provided he pays the appraised value of such part or parcel or all, as the case may be, to the secured creditors, as their interests may appear, and the trustee of the unsecured creditors, as his interests may appear, if a trustee is appointed, or he may put up a bond approved by the referee in bankruptcy that he will make payments, as provided for herein, of any property so consumed or disposed of.

"(6) In case the debtor fails to make any payments, as herein provided, to any or all of the secured creditors or to the trustee of the unsecured creditors, then such secured creditors or the trustee may proceed to enforce their pledge, lien, or encumbrances in accordance with law. It shall be the duty of the secured creditors and of the trustee of the unsecured creditors to discharge all liens of record in accordance with law whenever the debtor has paid the appraised value of any part, parcel, or all of his property as herein provided.

"(7) The secured creditors holding prior liens and the trustee of the unsecured creditors holding a general lien hereunder shall have all the rights of such lienholders under existing law except the extension of time and the reduction of the indebtedness to the amount of the appraised value of the debtor's property, and such debtor shall be discharged from all his debts, both private and public, as provided for in this act with the exception of those provided for and agreed to by him in this section."

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this amendment provides for adding a new subsection to section 75 of the Bankruptcy Act, entitled, "Agricultural compositions and extensions." The amendment applies only to farmers.

I think it will be generally agreed that, under existing conditions, where farmers have been foreclosed, their creditors oftentimes have gotten nothing out of the proceeding, the land not selling for enough to pay the indebtedness against it, and creditors who are unsecured getting nothing at all.

I think, too, that every Senator here will agree that something should be done to save at least a part of the farmer's property, to have his debts scaled down. The amendment provides for the scaling down of the farmer's indebtedness; it provides that, under the control of the court, appraisers may be appointed, and a fair valuation placed upon the property, after exemptions are deducted. Then the farmer, if he wishes to retain possession of the land under control of the court, may do so, and, under the terms of the amendment, he can buy back the land, or pay for the property, as provided here, with a low rate of interest and over a period of 6½ years.

It seems to me that with this amendment enacted the mortgagee and other creditors would be better protected than they now are. As I have stated, under the present system many of them get nothing at all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment, it is intended to enable the farmer to go into a court of bankruptcy and have a composition with his creditors, and, under the authority of the court, to retain his property, if he desires so to do, upon the terms of the settlement agreed upon.

Mr. FRAZIER. That is it exactly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, is it not more than that? Is it not to be on the basis of appraised value?

Mr. FRAZIER. The amendment provides that the property may be appraised, not necessarily at its cash value, but it implies a fair and reasonable valuation of the property at the time the appraisement is made.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The purpose of the amendment is to give to farmers the privilege now extended to municipalities, and, under the pending bill, to corporations, to get rid of some of their debts on a fair basis fixed by the court. Is that correct?

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think we are all anxious to extend further relief to the farmer, particularly where that relief is calculated and designed to prevent or reduce the number of foreclosures. But attention is called to the fact that the effect of the proposed amendment would be to permit the owner of the property to retain it at its appraised value, and to pay off the indebtedness with interest at the rate of 1 percent per annum. It must be understood that the effect of the amendment would be to give the farmer a moratorium, with the exception of 1-percent interest, for a very long period of time.

Mr. FRAZIER. A period of 6½ years.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Assume that a mortgage is bearing 5-percent interest. The mortgagee, under this arrangement, would get 1-percent interest on the amount at which the farm should be appraised. It would probably be appraised at its current value, that is, its value at the time of appraisal, and unquestionably the operation of the amendment would be to reduce the value of the creditor's lien.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I think it must be admitted that at the present time the value of the creditor's lien is in many instances very, very small, and I think in many cases this provision would give the creditor a better settlement, more money, than he would get under the ordinary procedure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That might be true in some instances. May I ask the Senator whether the amendment has been considered by any standing committee of the Senate?

Mr. FRAZIER. No; when the bill was up for consideration several days ago, I submitted a copy of the amendment to the chairman of the subcommittee and also to the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, and asked them to consider it, stating that I wanted to offer it as an amendment, and would like to have it accepted and go to conference for further consideration, to be threshed out in conference. The chairman of the subcommittee and the chairman of the full committee were very favorable and friendly to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The opportunity to consider the amendment has not been heretofore afforded me, and it is noted that the provision in relation to the subject is as follows:

> The debtor shall agree and bind himself that he will pay to the secured creditors, as their interests may appear, and to the trustee of the unsecured creditors, as his interests may appear, if a trustee is appointed, the value of the property as fixed by the appraisal together with interest at the rate of 1 percent per annum on the following terms: 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 6 months from date of agreement; 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 12 months; 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 18 months; 2½ percent, together with interest on or before 24 months, and that thereafter he will pay 5 percent principal, together with interest semiannually for the following 4 years and will pay the balance on or before 6 months after the last semiannual payment has been made to the secured creditors, as their interests may appear, and to the trustee of the unsecured creditors, as his interests may appear, if a trustee is appointed.

So the interest rate for 24 months is 1 percent, and after 24 months it is 5 percent. The effect of it is, of course, to seek to give to the debtor the advantage of a nominal rate of interest—1 percent—for 2 years, and an arbitrary rate, without regard to the rate fixed in the contract, of 5 percent after the end of 2 years.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator from Arkansas will permit me to make the suggestion, I will say it appears to me that the debtor does not pay 5-percent interest at any time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; the Senator from Minnesota is right. I accept the correction. The 5 percent is principal, so that the interest rate is fixed at 1 percent for the entire time.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do not want to interfere with the Senator. If he intends to make an address I can wait until he is through, if the Senator would rather have me do so.

If the Senator from North Dakota does not object, I desire to call attention to the bill providing for refinancing of farm mortgages, which was enacted into law last spring. We were told at that time that the farmer would have an opportunity to meet with his creditor and have the principal of his debt reduced. There was nothing compulsory on the creditor to accept any reduction of principal. It had to be done by mutual consent. Since the passage of that law, complaints have come to me from all over my State, and from other States, that the farmer has not been able to induce the creditor to agree to a reduction of his indebtedness; and unless he did secure such an agreement he could not have his debt refinanced, and he would lose his property.

It seems to me, irrespective of the question of the amount of the interest, that if we are to relieve corporations in the manner proposed in the pending bill, by giving them a chance to compel creditors to accept what is found to be just and fair, if we are to take the bankruptcy route back to recovery, we ought to give the farmer the same benefit of having the law provide that his creditor must come into court and accept the judgment of the court as to what he ought to take for the amount he has loaned on the property. If municipalities and corporations are to be given that privilege, it ought to be extended to the farmer.

The farmer must meet his creditor as an individual. He must get his consent. A corporation is not compelled to do that. If we pass the pending bill, I think such action, together with the action we took yesterday with regard to municipalities, will result in putting us on the road of wholesale bankruptcy as a step toward recovery.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I understand from a number of my colleagues that they voted for the bill yesterday believing that that was the case—that we were on the road to wholesale bankruptcy in order to attain recovery. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota. I do not see why we might not extend this benefit to the farmer and go right along with it. We are coming to it anyway.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. With all due respect to those who do not agree with me, I think we will find it a very rocky and a long, disagreeable road. Ever since the depression I have seen only two ways to go. One was through some form of inflation, cheapening the value of the dollar to the value which the dollar had at the time it was borrowed. The other was to go the road of wholesale bankruptcy, deflation, which means chaos if we begin to repudiate as we are doing now. With respect to municipalities and corporations, I admit that their debts must in some way be liquidated; either by means of inflation or by repudiation. If we start on the road of bankruptcy it is hard to tell where we shall end. If we start with municipalities and go on with corporations, we shall come down to individuals. I know men who perhaps are better qualified than I am to judge the possible effect, but still I feel it my duty to express my opinion that what is proposed here will damage further than it is already damaged the credit system which has failed to function since it blew up in 1929.

The basis of all credit is ability to pay debts. The credit system will not function unless debtors can pay. The way to make it possible for debtors to pay is to make it possible for them to pay debts. Their debts cannot be paid in the present value of the dollar. If we are determined to go this road, however, we cannot give the benefit of this form of debt settlement to municipalities and corporations without giving it to individuals in order to have equality before the law. We cannot legislate benefits for one group of citizens which we deny to another group.

If we are to have equality before the law, we shall have to have municipalities meet with the creditors and by mutual consent agree to a reduction in debt. That is the legislation we gave to agriculture. But we do not do that for municipalities. We are not doing that for corporations. We are compelling the unwilling creditor to come in—and it is fair that he should come in, if this is the way we are to travel—and make a fair settlement and accept the judgment of the court as to what the debtor can pay. There may be some controversy with respect to that suggestion.

There is another principle involved, which is the amount of interest the debtor is to pay. That is an entirely different matter; but the principle involved of applying to agriculture the same rule which we apply to a corporation or to a municipality is absolutely sound. Any other provision would violate one of the most fundamental principles of the American system of government, or of any other government that pretends to dispense justice among its citizens—the principle of equality before the law.

I thank the Senator from North Dakota for yielding to me.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the following language will be found at the beginning of the amendment, page 1, line 5:

> Any farmer failing to obtain the acceptance of a majority in number and amount of all creditors whose claims are affected by a composition or extension proposal may amend his petition or answer asking to be adjudged a bankrupt.

In other words, if the farmer can get a settlement with his creditor or an extension of time, of course, this amendment would not apply to his case; but if he should fail to get that satisfactory settlement or extension of time, this amendment would give the farmer a chance to pay out on his property and continue as a home owner and landowner.

Under the present Farm Land Bank Act which was passed at the special session, and of which the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] spoke, the loan is to be made on 50 percent of the appraised valuation of the land and not to exceed 20 percent of the insurable value of the building. That brings the average loaning value upon that property down to less than 50 percent of its appraised valuation; and there are literally thousands of cases, Mr. President, where under the existing law the appraisal by the land-bank appraisers is not sufficient to give the farmer a large enough loan to allow him to pay his indebtedness, and the bank refuses to make the loan unless all his indebtedness can be cleaned up before the loan is to be made.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. In the Omaha land-bank district a study I made the other day reveals that in the commitments made by that bank there is a failure to close the loan in one third of the instances, and except for the State moratorium law in Iowa there would have been foreclosures had in those cases. There were 6,000 petitions in foreclosure filed in Iowa alone last year. Innumerable other farms were deeded in consideration of the farmer being permitted to remain on the farm for the remainder of the year. Except in isolated cases where the insurance companies had made too large a loan, they decline absolutely to accept anything less than the face of the indebtedness.

With one third of those who seek loans from the Government under the refinancing plan being denied any relief, that plan is failing of attaining the benefits sought. That indebtedness was incurred at a time when there was credit inflation. As the Senator from Minnesota said a moment ago, he thought—and I am in entire agreement with him—that there would be monetary inflation which would have the effect of increasing prices and making possible the refinancing of farm debts. We have had no monetary inflation, and there is no prospect we will have any such inflation. So we are assured, without inflation, that at least one third of those under mortgage debts will not be benefited by a refinancing program.

That program started on the assumption that there is a Santa Claus; that the creditors voluntarily would forgive the debts of the debtors; but in the operation of the system it is found that the creditors are not of a Santa Claus disposition, and that they decline to forgive debts except in instances where there is utterly no hope of collecting.

The amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota is in line with the decision of the Supreme Court in the Minnesota moratorium cases. Yesterday in the bankruptcy bill which was passed we expressed the principle which is sought to be expressed here today in the pending bill. If we start on this road of enabling debtors to take advantage of bankruptcy proceedings, we ought logically to carry on and adopt the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota in some acceptable form. Otherwise, I fear that the mortgage-refinancing program to which the administration has committed itself must, in the absence of inflation, be viewed as a failure.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, so far as the farmer is concerned, there has been practically nothing done up to date to save him in the possession of his property and his home. The Senator from Arkansas seemed to take exception to the provision of 1-percent interest on the payments, under the court's order, on the property he is buying back; but I want to say that the fact that the farmers have been paying a high rate of interest in the past is largely responsible for the fact that they are losing their homes and farms today by the hundreds of thousands all over the United States.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. As I understand, the Senator from North Dakota has voted for silver legislation and for expanding the currency here with others of us for about 2 years, has he not?

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes; and I voted for the bankruptcy bill yesterday.

Mr. LONG. Yes; we passed yesterday a bankruptcy bill for municipalities; we also passed a railroad bankruptcy bill; and we have now before us a corporation bankruptcy bill. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], as I agreed with him 2 years ago, that we were faced with one of two alternatives, either putting this country through a wringer, which I much less desired, or of expanding the currency.

I believe now if we would turn around today and provide for the remonetization of silver at 16 to 1 that we could avoid this legislation and rescind the action we took yesterday in passing the municipal bankruptcy bill; but if we are going the route of bankruptcy—and that is the route we are going—I do not see how we are going to provide a limitation. It looks to me as though we are going to have to put the farmer in; and I do not see how we are going to leave anybody else out, if we are going to wholesale repudiation. We went to wholesale repudiation in the bill we passed yesterday; when we passed that bill we were through so far as saying how we are going to try to expand the currency or pay our debts.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I think there is a good deal of truth in what the Senator says. I want to include the farmers and give them to chance to save their property.

Mr. LONG. I think the Senator is right about that; I do not see how we can leave the farmers out. I do not see any justification for leaving the farmers out, if we are going along on this route on which we have already started and on which we are traveling fast.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If we take in municipalities, corporations, railroads, and farmers, what about other people?

Mr. LONG. I think we are going to have to take in all of them. I do not see how we are going to limit such action to anybody. We have got to take either one of two things, because we owe $272,000,000,000 worth of money in this country and it cannot be paid, apparently. So it looks to me as though when we started on this very dangerous course of repudiation of debts, public and private, that we set in motion something that is going to be mighty hard to stop. I do not see how we are going to be able to allow repudiation in one case and not allow it in the other. That is why I was not willing to cast my vote yesterday, to begin with, for the first repudiation bill that we passed. From this time on, I do not see how we can stop it.

Mr. FRAZIER. I did not like to vote for the bankruptcy bill which we passed on yesterday, either, but in view of the situation as it exists I did not see how we were going to get away from it; how the cities affected could ever pay out, under existing conditions, I could not see; and I do not see how the farmer can pay out under existing conditions. He cannot pay the high rate of interest. He is losing his farm and his home which oftentimes he and his family have spent a lifetime in building up. He is losing them because he cannot meet existing conditions; he cannot pay the high rate of interest. This measure would simply give the farmer a chance to go through bankruptcy, save his property, or, at least, save a part of it, and continue as a home owner and a landowner.

Mr. President, in view of the fact that the farmer has generally been in harder conditions than any other class of people, because he is always forced to sell his product below the cost of production, or, at least, at the price that the other fellow fixes for him, which is generally below the cost of production, and that the farmer produces the food commodities and other necessities which are essential in order that the people of this Nation may live. I think the farmers are due to receive this consideration of being given an opportunity to save their homes and their farms and to continue to carry on as American farmers.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, as chairman of the subcommittee I want to remind Members of the Senate that this amendment was presented on the floor. The subcommittee in charge of this House measure has never had an opportunity of examining it. From a casual reading of it last night and this morning, it is my opinion that this proposed amendment is too far-reaching to be tacked on to this corporation relief bill at this time without thorough consideration by a committee.

I understand that there is a House measure pending incorporating all the principles embodied in this amendment, a measure going through the regular vehicles and channels of investigation by the proper committees; and I doubt very seriously the propriety at this time, with the lack of information and investigation as to this far-reaching measure, that it should be adopted as a floor amendment to this corporation bill.

In response to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], I agree with him thoroughly that the farmer should be extended equal opportunities and privileges under relief measures; but under the act of March 3, 1933, the farmers were given, or at least they were intended to be given, the same relief from debt that is afforded by the corporation bill now pending.

The Senator from Minnesota is probably more familiar with the act which gave relief to the farmers than am I, but as I read it today the farmer may compose his debts upon the acceptance of a majority of all his creditors. I think that is the law today, is it not?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The farmer may do so by mutual consent of the creditors; but he is not able to get that consent.

Mr. VAN NUYS. We required by an amendment adopted yesterday that 75 percent of the debtors of municipal corporations should consent, and by the pending bill we are requiring the consent of 66⅔ percent in amount of each class of creditors.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And it is made compulsory, as I understand.

Mr. VAN NUYS. No; unless such consent is obtained the court cannot confirm the plan.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I understand this bill would compel the minority to accept.

Mr. VAN NUYS. All the bills of this character do that; that is true. It is binding upon the minority.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In the farm bill of a year ago it was not compulsory.

Mr. VAN NUYS. I think it was; I may be mistaken, but I had the act in front of me just now.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to see this amendment go over until tomorrow, for I do not think we should hastily exclude it from the bill. I cannot see any difference in principle between this proposal and similar provisions which we have been incorporating in other measures; but I doubt if we are ready to pass upon it this afternoon. Could we not permit the entire bill to go over until tomorrow?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I have two other amendments which I desire to offer. In the case of one of them there will not be any controversy, but as to the other there may be controversy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to interfere with the program of the Senator from North Dakota, but it is true that we have had but a very few minutes to consider the amendment, and I simply express the wish that it go over until tomorrow. I shall not insist upon it.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I will say that I should be very glad to see it go over until tomorrow, so that further consideration may be given the amendment. I wish to say to the Senator that the bill in the House, which is practically the same as the amendment submitted by me, was referred to a subcommittee there and reported favorably by that subcommittee after consideration and some hearings upon it.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Is it identical with the amendment which the Senator presents?

Mr. FRAZIER. I think it is identical with it.

Mr. VAN NUYS. That was my understanding. The pending amendment is so foreign to the intendment and purposes of the original House measure that I doubt the propriety of tacking it on at this late hour to that measure.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I agree with the Senator from Idaho. I think it would be a good idea if the bill could be laid aside this afternoon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending bill be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of——

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas withhold that request for a few moments, unless it is important to have some other measure considered immediately? I have one or two amendments which I should like to submit before the bill is laid aside.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. I withhold the request for the present.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to section 76 of the bankruptcy act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] is temporarily laid aside. The amendment of the Senator from Delaware will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to amend section 76 of the act of July 1, 1898, as amended, so as to read as follows:

Extensions made pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this chapter shall extend the obligation of any person who is secondarily liable for or who may have insured or guaranteed such debt or debts, or any part thereof, or bonds issued upon the security of the same, and a copy of the order confirming such extension, certified as required by the provisions of law with reference to judgments and proceedings in courts of the United States, shall be sufficient evidence that such extension has been confirmed in any suit or proceeding brought against any such person so liable.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to say that the attention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] and myself has been called to the fact that this section, which was passed in connection with the provisions relating to the farmer and which were intended to give an extension to the person who guaranteed the mortgage, did not cover all the cases which ought to be covered. The amendment in the language which has just been stated is for that purpose. The Senator from Indiana is agreeable to accepting the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I send to the desk another amendment, which I offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 30, lines 7 to 14, inclusive, it is proposed to strike out section 3 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. In the administration of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, as amended, the district court or any judge thereof shall make in its or his discretion such an equitable distribution of appointments as receiver as will prevent any persons, firms, or corporations from having a monopoly of such appointments within such district.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to say that I am offering the amendment largely at the suggestion of Judge Knox, senior district judge of the State of New York. The matter involved here has been in controversy for some 2 or 3 years. During the whole time we were discussing the Bankruptcy Act and holding hearings on it there was constant application to the committee for and against the proposal which has been written into the bill by the House. Representative CELLER, of New York, I think, is largely responsible for the provision having been written into the bill.

I might say to the Senate that 2 or 3 years ago—I have forgotten just how long ago—there was a great scandal in New York with respect to proceedings in bankruptcy cases. All the members of the district courts of New York reached the conclusion that the only way to cure the condition was to appoint some one institution to act as trustee in all bankruptcy cases. The particular institution selected was the Irving Trust Co. There is no doubt that the Irving Trust Co. has done a very fine job. The various mercantile associations of New York, the district judges of New York, and a great many others are interested in preserving that right to appoint the Irving Trust Co. in these cases.

Personally, I have spent a great deal of time trying to work out some plan which would relieve the charge that this is in the hands of a monopoly, a charge that is being successfully made because it is a fact. The Irving Trust Co. has a great force of clerks and experts administering the estates.

Since the bill passed the House I have been informed by Judge Knox and by Representative CELLER, who was instrumental in having this provision written in the bill, that they had reached some sort of satisfactory agreement. Representative CELLER is ill and I have not been able to find out what the agreement is that was reached. My sole object in proposing to strike out the section is that it will give to the conferees an opportunity to debate the proposed amendment which, I understand, is agreeable to all. If it turns out that it is not agreeable, then the action striking out the section may be disagreed to by the conferees.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, this question was thoroughly discussed by the subcommittee. While the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] is a very active member of the subcommittee, and has done a world of good work on the committee, I want personally to register my opposition to striking out section 3. Section 3 is an amendment to the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, and is intended to prevent a monopoly in receiverships.

I happen to be a member of a special committee which worked for over a month in California last fall in the matter of investigating proceedings in Federal receiverships and bankruptcies. Witness after witness came before our committee who, when asked what his profession was, replied "professional receiver", which was actually true. Half a dozen men in Los Angeles have been kept on salaries of $10,000, $15,000, or $25,000 a year as professional receivers in the district courts of southern California. I know that condition exists in small degree in other judicial districts of the country.

It is true that the Irving Trust Co. by agreement is a sort of standing receiver in the district named by the distinguished Senator from Delaware. I do not believe that condition ought to be permitted to prevail. It has been abused viciously in many of the State and Federal courts of the country. I think an overwhelming majority of the upstanding lawyers of every local bar, who have in mind only to do justice to the creditors and are not there for the purpose of "milking" an estate, will verify my statement that this is one of the most wholesome provisions in the House measure now pending before the Senate.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I agree quite generally with many things stated by the Senator from Indiana. I have absolutely no personal interest in the matter. So far as I know, it applies almost wholly to the southern district of New York. I have talked to Judge Knox about it. I have a very high regard for him. He is senior judge of that district and the only person who has had any influence upon me at all in offering the amendment.

I know the truth of the statement of the Senator from Indiana as to the difficulties and the conditions which were found by his committee investigating bankruptcy proceedings; but I invite his attention to the fact that in New York, prior to the adoption of this rule, the conditions were very much worse than in any other place his committee investigated. The final remedy of those district judges, who had no interest in the world in the matter except to do that which was best for all concerned, was to adopt this rule.

I think myself the rule they adopted is a very drastic one. In the southern district of New York the rule itself provides that the Irving Trust Co. shall be selected; and I have told Judge Knox and told other persons interested that I thought that rule ought to be changed.

My only purpose in the world in offering this amendment is in the hope that when the matter reaches conference Representative CELLER, who, together with a great many other lawyers in the State of New York, has been interested in having this particular provision written in the bill, will have some plan worked out that will be better than this particular one. If this language should be adopted just as it is, it would leave no opportunity whatever to change it.

That is my sole interest in the matter and my only purpose in offering the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I was otherwise engaged, and did not hear the amendment. I will ask what it is.

Mr. HASTINGS. The amendment is to strike out section 3.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; I understand it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Section 3 provides that—

The district court or any judge thereof shall make in its or his discretion such an equitable distribution of appointments as receiver as will prevent any persons, firms, or corporations from having a monopoly of such appointments within such district.

That section was intended, I am quite certain, because I have been in touch with the subject for 2 or 3 years, to strike specifically at the Irving Trust Co., of New York, and the New York situation. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], and other Senators who were on the committee investigating the bankruptcy question, have assured me time and again that something ought to be done to remedy this situation, and I am quite certain I should agree with them; but I am afraid this language does not do that particular thing. On the other hand, it opens up a scandalous condition which existed in the city of New York prior to the adoption of the present rule by the district court judges.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, I never intended to impugn the motives of the Senator from Delaware. I know he is presenting a question which was presented to the subcommittee. This is a controversial section; but I believe there are just as many good and honest and upstanding men in the city of New York who are willing to serve their community and their State and their Government by accepting receiverships at reasonable compensation as there are in Indiana or Ohio or Illinois or any other State of the Union.

Having been for some time an officer of the United States court, I know that in the State of Indiana we had no trouble in finding receivers who would serve for reasonable compensation, and who did not try to capitalize and monopolize political affiliations or personal friendships with the judges of the Federal courts.

Mr. HASTINGS. Would not the Senator be satisfied to strike out this section with the understanding that unless the House itself, which adopted it, has some satisfactory substitute for it, the section may then be left as the House adopted it? I have no interest in the world in the matter except to afford an opportunity for the presentation of the compromise which Representative CELLER has not had an opportunity to present.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, I intend to move for a conference on this bill. If I am a member of the conference committee, I propose to maintain, as long as I can, the position I have assumed on the floor. If the Senate feels that it wants this matter to go to conference, that, of course, is up to the Senate. Personally, I shall stand for this section as originally passed by the House and approved by the subcommittee of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am fearful that if this amendment shall be stricken out we shall get nothing. I think myself the language could be improved a great deal; but the section is intended to strike at an evil which is a disgrace to civilization.

I know something about the condition which exists in New York; but it is not confined to New York alone. It is there seen probably in its worst form, but it exists to a limited extent all over the United States. It is a practice which has been going on for years. I think probably the judges themselves have realized now that they ought not to continue in a degree to use the power to appoint receivers in such a way as absolutely to destroy property which ought to be preserved, and which it is the duty of the court to preserve as far as possible.

I have an idea that if Senators would investigate they would find, without casting any reflection on or attributing an evil intent to district judges in other parts of the country, that it has been to a great extent the practice of the judges to adopt a course which is somewhat better than what has been done in New York, where there is such an extreme and glaring instance of the evil that is possible under existing law; but it is true also in Chicago. It is true in most large cities, at least to some extent; and it ought to be remedied.

I doubt whether the language of the bill which the Senator from Delaware seeks to strike out affords a full remedy. It does, however, call the attention of the judges of our district courts to the fact that this practice ought to be modified and that relief ought to come. I think to a great extent it will come because, as I said, I think a great many of the judges have followed the practice as a matter of form. They knew from their own experience that it had been the practice before they were judges, and they followed to a greater or less degree what they knew to be the unwritten rule and the general understanding in the district courts where receivers were to be appointed. I think the publicity which has now been given to the evil which exists is going to have a very good effect; but the bill as originally written simply asks the court to divide up these favors and not to give them to the personal friends of the judge. If Senators have had any experience with or any knowledge of the investigation which has been conducted by a House committee in the city of Chicago, I think they will find some glaring evils there. I do not know whether or not the language of the bill as passed by the House would really remedy them. In my judgment, it does not cover the matter as fully as it ought to cover it.

The fees allowed are sometimes—in fact, very often—ridiculously high. During an impeachment trial which grew out of occurrences on the Pacific coast, we saw some evidence of the evils that exist. When those things happen and a coterie of attorneys represent the receivers, it is not always the receivers but it is the attorneys for the receivers who get the large amounts of money.

The attorneys sometimes have friends engaged in this business whose appointments they secure with the idea that attorneys will be appointed to represent the receiver; and if there is a contest in court as to who is to be appointed receiver, the real contest behind the scenes often is over what attorneys the receiver will select after he has been appointed. That has a tendency to cause these attorneys very often to become almost slaves of the judge, and to bask in his favor whenever they can, in order that they may be successful in having their particular receivers appointed, in order that they in turn may be retained. That practice sometimes goes very high up in the bar associations.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator. In fact, I yield the floor.

Mr. GORE. No; I do not want the Senator to yield the floor. If the language of the bill is not sufficiently definite to prohibit the payment of excessive fees to receivers and their attorneys, why does not the Senator make the language sufficiently explicit? I think this is an abuse that calls loudly for correction; and in connection with what the Senator says I refer him to the situation in Chicago, and to the investigation now under way by a House committee.

The president of one of the utility concerns was receiving $5,000 a month as his salary. The court allowed him $5,000 a month additional as receiver, making $10,000 a month, $120,000 a year, or twice as much as he had been receiving as president of the concern.

The evidence developed that another lawyer in Chicago, a former member of the Cabinet, was allowed $140,000 for preparing what amounted to a brief reconciling and adjusting a State statute and a city ordinance—mere matters of that kind which could call for no such talent, no such service, and could justify no such fee.

In that connection, a member of the House committee which is conducting the investigation told me that President Taft, between the time he was President and the time he was Chief Justice, rendered some service for one of these concerns in Chicago, and submitted a bill for $1,500. That was his charge for his services. Those representing the concern indicated to him that they had expected to pay him as much as $25,000. He said that he had rendered the service and had fixed the fee, and he thought he was qualified to pass on the value of his services.

I think something ought to be inserted in the bill, if it is not there now, to stop that abuse, because it is a breach of trust, and it devours the estate which belongs to the citizens who contributed to it in the first instance.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not believe this provision ought to be stricken from the bill, for reasons which have been given by other Senators. On the other hand, the language of section 3 is in need of revision.

For instance, the judge is directed to make—

> Such an equitable distribution of appointments as receiver as will prevent—

And so forth.

I do not know how that language can be applied to the appointment of receivers. "Equitable distribution of appointments as receiver" is to me an incomprehensible expression. So I am going to make a suggestion which I believe will meet with the approval of the Senator from Nebraska and probably with the approval of the Senator from Oklahoma, as well as the Senators more directly interested in the bill, including the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Delaware.

Since the bill cannot pass today by reason of the fact that we have tentatively agreed that it shall go over on account of the Frazier amendment, why not let this amendment go over and let more thought be given to the language of section 3? I am sure that such able lawyers as the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Delaware will be able to improve the language.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has made a suggestion which I expected to make before I sat down.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I did not mean to anticipate the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very glad to have the suggestion made, since the bill will have to go over anyway. Before it goes over, however, I desire to say that the danger which confronts the Senate is that if we agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware, we may get nothing, and I would rather have what we have in the language now than to have nothing. About the only effect of the language of the bill, if we let it stand as it is, would be, as I take it, that a judge would feel that he ought not to appoint the same receiver in all receivership cases day in and day out. He would divide them up.

There ought to be something said about the receivers and the attorneys for receivers, and their fees. It ought to be said, I think, that the amount of the fee of a receiver and of an attorney for a receiver should be reasonable. I believe that is the law now, but if we say it again, probably more attention will be paid to it. It should be provided also that an appeal could be taken as to the amount of the fee, instead of it being left to the discretion of the judge, if anyone is dissatisfied with it.

I wonder whether the Senator in charge of the bill would not be willing to let this amendment go over with the other amendment.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I proposed the amendment, and I withdraw it for the present, and will offer it again tomorrow.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to appeal to the Senator from Indiana, and also to the Senator from Delaware, to see whether in the meantime they cannot agree on some language which will fit the situation which we all understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it was stated to me at one time, by a party interested in this matter—and I have been interested in it myself for some time—that the question of the fees of receivers in certain cases might be referred to the Attorney General. I do not know whether or not there would be any propriety in such a reference, but it seems to me that any safeguard would be better than no safeguard.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, for the purpose of getting it into conference. I may say that I am doing this by and with the consent of the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], who reported the bill. This is a matter about which I should like to think more, and I am asking that the amendment be agreed to, and be taken to conference in the form in which I offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 30, line 6, after the period, it is proposed to add the following:

Said section 74, as amended by the act of March 4, 1933, shall include the personal representative of a deceased individual for the purpose of effecting settlement or composition with the creditors of the estate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

LOANS BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS FOR INDUSTRIAL PURPOSES

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3487) relating to direct loans for industrial purposes by Federal Reserve banks, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is amended by adding after section 13a thereof a new section reading as follows:

"SEC. 13b. In exceptional circumstances, when it appears to the satisfaction of a Federal Reserve bank that an established industrial or commercial business located in its district is unable to obtain requisite financial assistance on a reasonable basis from the usual sources, the Federal Reserve bank, pursuant to authority granted by the Federal Reserve Board, may make loans to, or purchase obligations of, such business, or may make commitments with respect thereto, on a reasonable and sound basis, for the purpose of providing it with working capital, but no obligation shall be acquired or commitment made hereunder with a maturity exceeding 5 years.

"Each Federal Reserve bank shall also have power to discount for, or purchase from, any bank, trust company, mortgage company, credit corporation for industry, or other financing institution operating in its district, obligations having maturities not exceeding 5 years, entered into for the purpose of obtaining working capital for any such established industrial or commercial business; to make loans or advances direct to any such financing institution on the security of such obligations; and to make commitments with regard to such discount or purchase of obligations or with respect to such loans or advances on the security thereof, including commitments made in advance of the actual undertaking of such obligations. Each such financing institution shall obligate itself to the satisfaction of the Federal Reserve bank for at least 20 percent of any loss which may be sustained by such bank upon any of the obligations acquired from such financing institution, the existence and amount of any such loss to be determined in accordance with regulations of the Federal Reserve Board: Provided, That in lieu of such obligation against loss any such financing institution may advance at least 20 percent of such working capital for any established industrial or commercial business without obligating itself to the Federal Reserve bank against loss on the amount advanced by the Federal Reserve bank: Provided, however, That such advances by the financing institution and the Federal Reserve bank shall be considered as one advance, and repayment shall be made pro rata under such regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe.

"The aggregate amount of loans, advances, and commitments of the Federal Reserve banks outstanding under this section at any one time, plus the amount of purchases and discounts under this section held at the same time, shall not exceed the combined surplus of the Federal Reserve banks as of July 1, 1934, and all operations of the Federal Reserve banks under this section shall be subject to such regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe.

"For the purpose of aiding the Federal Reserve banks in carrying out the provisions of this section, there is hereby established in each Federal Reserve district an industrial advisory committee, to be appointed by the Federal Reserve bank subject to the approval and regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, and to be composed of not less than 3 nor more than 5 members as determined by the Federal Reserve Board. Each member of such committee shall be actively engaged in some industrial pursuit within the Federal Reserve district in which the committee is established, and each such member shall serve without compensation but shall be entitled to receive from the Federal Reserve bank of such district his necessary expenses while engaged in the business of the committee, or a per diem allowance in lieu thereof to be fixed by the Federal Reserve Board. Each application for any such loan, advance, purchase, discount, or commitment shall be submitted to the appropriate committee and, after an examination by it of the business with respect to which the application is made, the application shall be transmitted to the Federal Reserve bank, together with the recommendation of the committee."

SEC. 2. In order to enable the Federal Reserve banks to make the loans, discounts, advances, purchases, and commitments provided for in section 13b of the Federal Reserve Act, the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the enactment of this act, is authorized and directed to pay to each Federal Reserve bank such portion of the sum of $139,299,557 as may be represented by the par value of the holdings of each Federal Reserve bank of Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation stock, upon the execution by each Federal Reserve bank of its agreement (to be endorsed on the certificate of such stock) to hold such stock unencumbered and to pay to the United States all dividends, all payments on liquidation, and all other proceeds of such stock for which dividends, payments, and proceeds the United States shall be secured by such stock itself. Each Federal Reserve bank, in addition, shall agree that, in the event such dividends, payments, and other proceeds in any calendar year do not aggregate 1 percent of the par value of said stock, it will pay to the United States in such year such further amount, if any, up to 1 percent of the par value of such stock, as shall be covered by the net earnings of the bank for that year derived from the use of the sum so paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that for said amount so due the United States shall have a first claim against such earnings and stock, and further that it will continue such payments until the final liquidation of said stock by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. The sum so paid to each Federal Reserve bank by the Secretary of the Treasury shall become a part of the surplus fund of such Federal Reserve bank within the meaning of section 13b of the Federal Reserve Act. All amounts required to be expended by the Secretary of the Treasury in order to carry out the provisions of this section shall be paid out of the miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury created by the increment resulting from the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar under the President's proclamation of January 31, 1934; and there is hereby appropriated, out of such receipts, such sum as shall be required for such purpose.

SEC. 3. Section 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Tenth. Liabilities incurred under the provisions of section 13b of the Federal Reserve Act."

SEC. 4. Section 22 of the Federal Reserve Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(h) Whoever makes any material statement, knowing it to be false, or whoever willfully overvalues any security, for the purpose of influencing in any way the action of a Federal Reserve bank upon any application, commitment, advance, discount, purchase, or loan, or any extension thereof by renewal, deferment of action, or otherwise, or the acceptance, release, or substitution of security therefor, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both.

"(i) Whoever, being connected in any capacity with a Federal Reserve bank (1) embezzles, abstracts, purloins, or willfully misapplies any moneys, funds, securities, or other things of value, whether belonging to it or pledged or otherwise intrusted to it, or (2) with intent to defraud any Federal Reserve bank, or any other body politic or corporate, or any individual, or to deceive any officer, auditor, or examiner, makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of or to a Federal Reserve bank, or, without being duly authorized, draws any order or issues, puts forth, or assigns any note, debenture, bond, or other obligation, or draft, mortgage, judgment, or decree shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

"(j) The provisions of sections 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, and 117 of the Criminal Code of the United States, insofar as applicable, are extended to apply to contracts or agreements of any Federal Reserve bank under this act, which, for the purposes hereof, shall be held to include advances, loans, discounts, purchase, and repurchase agreements; extensions and renewals thereof; and acceptances, releases, and substitutions of security therefor.

"(k) It shall be unlawful for any person to stipulate for or give or receive, or consent or agree to give or receive, any fee, commission, bonus, or thing of value for procuring or endeavoring to procure from any Federal Reserve bank any advance, loan, or extension of credit or discount or purchase of any obligation or commitment with respect thereto, either directly from such Federal Reserve bank or indirectly through any financing institution, unless such fee, commission, bonus, or thing of value and all material facts with respect to the arrangement or understanding therefor shall be disclosed in writing in the application or request for such advance, loan, extension of credit, discount, purchase, or commitment. Any violation of the provisions of this paragraph shall be punishable by imprisonment for not more than 1 year or by a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or both. If a director, officer, employee, or agent of any Federal Reserve bank shall knowingly violate this paragraph, he shall be held liable in his personal and individual capacity for any loss or damage sustained by such Federal Reserve bank in consequence of such violation."

SEC. 5. Section 10 of the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, is further amended by changing the period at the end of the third paragraph thereof to a comma and inserting thereafter the following: "and such assessments may include amounts sufficient to provide for the acquisition by the Board in its own name of such site or building in the District of Columbia as in its judgment alone shall be necessary for the purpose of providing suitable and adequate quarters for the performance of its functions. After approving such plans, estimates, and specifications as it shall have caused to be prepared, the Board may, notwithstanding any other provision of law, cause to be constructed on the site so acquired by it a building suitable and adequate, in its judgment, for its purposes, and proceed to take all such steps as it may deem necessary or appropriate in connection with the construction, equipment, and furnishing of such building. The Board may maintain, enlarge, or remodel any building so acquired or constructed and shall have sole control of such building and space therein."

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, this bill may be briefly explained, because it is very simple.

There has been such a demand in the country for aid to small going industries that some weeks ago it was proposed to set up within the Federal Reserve System 12 intermediate banks to make industrial and commercial loans for a period of 5 years. Some of us thought that it was totally unnecessary to set up another banking system of 12 banks to do what might be done more readily and with greater facility by the Federal Reserve banks themselves. Therefore, we prepared, and the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate has unanimously reported, Senate bill 3487, which accomplishes the purpose.

The bill authorizes the Federal Reserve banks to make direct loans for industrial and commercial purposes to going concerns in a total amount of the surplus fund of the Federal Reserve Banks as of July 1, 1934, which will at that time amount to approximately, if not exactly, $140,000,000.

In addition to that, the Government is to return to the Federal Reserve banks from the fund taken as a direct profit from the Federal Reserve banks by the devaluation of the dollar a like amount, practically $140,000,000, making a total sum of $280,000,000 available for this particular purpose.

The bill provides for the appointment of an advisory committee in each Federal Reserve district, to be composed exclusively of active industrialists, to advise upon such loans. I may say that that provision was inserted at the suggestion of the President, who thought that perhaps the Federal Reserve bank boards were too bank-minded to be as liberal as he could wish they would be in treating matters of this sort.

There are the usual penal provisions of the bill for violation of the law which attach to all bank bills. The only other provision of the bill is section 5, which authorizes the Federal Reserve board to secure a site, and to build thereon, in their judgment, a building for the use of the Federal Reserve System here in Washington. That is not to cost the Government a cent. The assessment is to be made against the Federal Reserve banks to pay for the site, as well as the building, should one be constructed.

In that connection I may say that the Federal Reserve System here in Washington now is in very confined quarters in the Treasury Building, with the exception of the fact that they have been compelled to rent two complete floors of the new Shoreham Office Building for the transaction of their business.

Mr. President, this, briefly, is the bill, unanimously reported from the committee, and I ask that it be passed.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the proper place it is proposed to add a new section, to read as follows:

The provisions of section 21 (a) (2) of the Banking Act of 1933 (relating to engaging in the business of receiving deposits by certain financial institutions not subject to examination and regulation under State or Federal law) shall not take effect until June 16, 1935.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator, the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which subcommittee I am chairman, now has that proposition before it, together with another proposition to defer for the period of a year the liquidation of affiliates which have been separated under the law.

Mr. RUSSELL. If the Senator from Virginia thinks that measure is likely to be reported to the Senate during the present session, very well.

Mr. GLASS. I think it will be reported in a very short time.

Mr. RUSSELL. This proposed legislation is very important to my State.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that I think the bill to which I have referred will be reported in a very short time.

Mr. GEORGE. I hope my colleague will withdraw his amendment in this form. I will say that it is a matter of very great importance.

Mr. GLASS. It is. We realize that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, do I understand that the Presiding Officer is about to place the bill on its final passage?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendment to be proposed.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia a question. As I read in the press, an effort was made before the committee to give this authority to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That effort was unavailing. Do I understand that shortly there will come before the committee the bill giving to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation power to loan money to private industry?

Mr. GLASS. There is now pending before the committee a bill which might be spoken of as a supplement to this bill, proposing to give the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the authority to make direct loans to going industries, provided the applicants for loans establish to the satisfaction of the Corporation the fact that they have been unable to procure loans from member banks or from the Federal Reserve banks direct.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator from Oregon that the committee has been considering such a bill, and today I was authorized to introduce a bill which covers the situation up to date. That is, the original bill has been amended in some respects, and I have today introduced a bill on that very subject which the committee will take up next Monday.

Mr. McNARY. I am very glad to have that statement from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in that connection, some of us on the Committee on Banking and Currency who have been interested in the bill now under consideration have been very much concerned over supplementary legislation authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make direct loans to industries which may not be able to qualify under strict rules as they may be administered by the Federal Reserve banks and by the member banks. As the Senator from Florida has stated, the committee has been considering that matter coincidentally with the consideration of the bill now before the Senate. The bill under consideration was voted out first and put on the calendar. The other bill has not been acted upon.

We practically agreed today upon a bill which has been introduced by the Senator from Florida. That agreement involved many amendments to a previously introduced bill. It had been my purpose to offer as an amendment to the pending bill an amendment covering the bill which we have practically agreed upon in the Committee on Banking and Currency; but with the assurance that we shall in all likelihood obtain favorable action Monday on that bill and get it on the calendar, I shall refrain from offering that amendment, because I do not desire to embarrass the Senator from Virginia or his bill. I hope we may be able to report on Monday the bill to which I have referred and secure prompt action upon it, because I think, as between the two, that bill will render more real assistance to industry which is now in need of credit than the bill under consideration.

Mr. McNARY. Is it the opinion of the Senator from Virginia that the favorable consideration of this bill will impede or interfere in any way with the consideration of the other bill?

Mr. GLASS. Not at all.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no objection to the bill. Indeed, I favor it. I observe the absence of a number of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency. In fairness to them, and in fairness to the other Members of the Senate, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 9, after line 6, it is proposed to insert the following:

PART II

METALLIC MONETARY RESERVES—GOLD 70 PERCENT, SILVER 30 PERCENT

SECTION 1. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to use both gold and silver as standard money and as the basis for the issuance of currency and as reserves in the Federal Reserve banks and in the Treasury of the United States on a ratio of 70 percent in gold and 30 percent in silver.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of promoting the general welfare by a wider use of silver as money, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Export-Import Bank of Washington (hereinafter referred to as the "bank") are authorized to acquire, purchase, and use silver in the manner hereinafter provided.

SEC. 3. The bank is hereby authorized and directed to negotiate with foreign buyers with the view of selling American agricultural surpluses and manufactured articles and goods produced in the United States at the world market price, such agricultural surpluses and manufactured goods to be paid for by said foreign buyers in silver coin or bullion at such value per ounce as may be agreed upon by the bank and said foreign buyers: Provided, however, That the bank shall accept silver bullion or coin at a price in excess of the world market price of not less than 10 nor more than 25 percent. The bank is authorized to enter into option contracts with foreign buyers, to deliver to them agricultural surplus products and/or manufactured goods at the world market price and accept in payment for same silver bullion or coin at such value per fine ounce as may be agreed upon and as provided herein.

SEC. 4. The bank is further authorized to purchase such agricultural surplus products and/or manufactured goods as may be deemed necessary to fulfill option contracts with foreign buyers or to make deliveries to foreign buyers for the purpose of carrying out this act. The bank is authorized to employ any governmental agency or agencies in securing the amount of agricultural surplus products and/or manufactured goods necessary to make such deliveries, and to enter into contracts with the producers of such products as may be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 5. The bank is authorized and directed to deposit the silver bullion or coin received in exchange for the said products sold to foreign buyers with the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately cause to be issued against such silver bullion or coin silver certificates based upon and equal to the exact price, including premium, at which such silver was received. The silver certificates so issued shall be used by the bank to pay for the agricultural products and/or manufactured goods sold to foreign buyers under the provisions of this act: Provided, That the bank is hereby authorized to arrange necessary credits with the Federal Reserve banks and/or the Federal Treasury to carry out the provisions in and the purposes of this act.

SEC. 6. The bank is hereby directed to authorize the farmers' cooperative marketing associations and other marketing agencies to enter into contracts for the sale of American agricultural surplus products in exchange for silver bullion or coin at such value per ounce as the bank shall determine, and the same provisions in reference to the issuance of silver certificates and the limitation as to the amount at which the silver coin or bullion shall be valued as above set forth in preceding section hereof shall apply to this section.

SEC. 7. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to accept any deposits of silver for the Treasury of the United States which such Secretary, subject to regulations prescribed by the bank, is satisfied have been imported into the United States in payment for agricultural surplus products and/or manufactured goods sold and delivered, or to be delivered, to foreign buyers for exportation at a price which shall from time to time be determined and fixed by the said bank as provided herein. The Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to issue for the account of the Treasury, against the silver so deposited, silver certificates based upon and equal to the exact price, including premium per fine ounce, and deliver same to the owner of such silver who tenders same to the Secretary of the Treasury under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. Upon receipt of such silver bullion or coin the bank shall deliver same to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately cause to be issued against such silver bullion or coin silver certificates, as provided herein, in denominations of $1, $5, $10, $20, and $100.

SEC. 9. The silver bullion received under the provisions of this act shall be stored in the Treasury of the United States in blocks or bricks of standardized or uniform fineness and in convenient units by weight and stamped by authorized official stamp as may be determined within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 10. Nationalization of silver: For the purpose of increasing our monetary metallic reserves, the broadening of the base of our monetary system, and carrying out the purposes of this act, it is herein declared to be necessary to make a wider use of silver as money, and as the basis for the issuance of currency and credit, and for bank and Federal Treasury reserves, and because of such public necessity the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to take title to all monetary silver bullion domiciled within the United States and its possessions for the public use and general welfare: Provided, That immediately upon the approval of this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue a proclamation embodying rules and regulations for carrying into effect the policy herein outlined and adopted: Provided further, That in taking title to and possession of such monetary silver bullion the Secretary of the Treasury shall ascertain and fix a fair price for such bullion, not less than the highest world price for spot fine silver on the day preceding issuance of the proclamation, and in no event at a price in excess of 50 cents per fine ounce, and shall pay such fixed price to the owner or owners of such bullion in the manner herein provided: Provided further, That hereafter silver dollars shall not be coined save by order of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided further, That all silver accepted and received by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be tested, assayed, and, if necessary, refined and converted into silver bars of suitable sizes and weights and deposited in the Treasury of the United States, all under rules and regulations to be prescribed and promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as authority to recall silver dollars now in circulation or as authority to melt those now in the Treasury of the United States or in any of the banks of the Federal Reserve System.

SEC. 11. Permissive purchases of silver: In addition to the powers granted in section 10, after January 1, 1935, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to purchase silver bullion wherever silver shall be procurable, at a price to be fixed by him from time to time as provided herein, and the silver so purchased shall be paid for, held, and deposited as provided in this act.

SEC. 12. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause silver certificates to be printed in such denominations as he may deem advisable and shall keep such certificates available for payment for such silver accepted and received as provided herein: Provided, That such certificates shall be issued in amounts equal to the price paid for the silver received: Provided further, That payment shall be made to the person or persons, firm, association, corporation, or bank tendering, delivering, or surrendering such silver at the price fixed as provided herein.

SEC. 13. The bank is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 14. The receipt and purchase of silver under this act shall continue until the general domestic price level as measured by the index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics shall equal the price level of 1926, and/or until the United States shall have secured and added silver to our monetary reserves to the extent of 30 percent of such total metallic reserves as measured by intrinsic or standard dollar value, whereupon in either instance the acquisition and purchase of silver under this act shall be suspended: Provided, That if thereafter such general price level shall fall as much as three points or to 97, as measured by such price level as herein defined, or if the value of such silver reserves having been increased to equal 30 percent in value of our total monetary metallic reserves and thereafter such silver reserves are reduced in value, then in either event silver purchases, exchanges, and acquisitions as provided herein shall be resumed in such amounts monthly as may be necessary to the end that such 1926 general price level shall be maintained and/or the value of such silver reserves shall be increased to equal 30 percent of such total monetary metallic reserves: Provided, That the policy of securing and preserving 30 percent of our metallic monetary reserves in silver shall be maintained.

SEC. 15. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 16. The provisions of this act are hereby declared to be supplemental to provisions of law respecting silver heretofore enacted.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he is willing to have a vote on his amendment at this time?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement, which I think may answer the question propounded by the Senator from Virginia.

Owing to the work of Senators in conferences and in committees, it is impossible for some of us to be on the floor at all the sessions. I happen to be chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations considering the District of Columbia appropriation bill. Our sessions begin at 10:30 o'clock and usually run until about 1 o'clock. I am also a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs. During the past several days that committee has held sessions in the afternoon. Such work makes it impossible for some of us to be on the floor at all hours during the sessions of the Senate.

I did not know the particular bill now before the Senate was coming up this afternoon. I make no complaint, because any bill may be called up at any time by unanimous consent. It so happens that I came into the Chamber at the exact moment the Chair was about to put the question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. President, the money question, I believe, is the most important question pending before the Congress and the American people. I may be in error, but in my judgment there is no other question that begins to compare in importance to the money question in the minds of millions of our citizens. There has been little time taken during this second session of the Seventy-third Congress in discussions of that question. Efforts have been made to get some monetary adjustments which would bring results, but thus far the results are in the reverse direction to what those seeking to secure them have desired.

It appears now that, instead of going ahead on the program we thought we were starting last year, the Nation is going into reverse. Prices are falling. Wheat is selling today in England at less than it sold for 1 year ago. English gold can buy American wheat at a lower price now than 12 months ago. The same is practically true of cotton and, likewise, of many other American products.

A year ago when our monetary policy was under discussion the dollar in buying power or value was worth $1.67. Through the various activities of all the programs of the Congress and the administration, including the expenditure of many billions of money, we have only succeeded in reducing the buying power of the dollar 31 cents. It was $1.67. Today it is $1.36. All our programs have only resulted in cheapening the American dollar, in terms of buying power in America, to the extent of 31 cents. The American dollar, the kind we have in our pockets—not gold, because we have no gold in circulation—still is worth today $1.36 in buying power. The farmers and the people of the country who work and produce must give of their wealth and labor $1.36 worth of services and material to get a dollar. Because of this fact taxes are not being paid. The people cannot pay their taxes. It is impossible. They cannot get the money.

Yesterday the Senate passed the municipal bankruptcy bill against which I voted for the very good reason that I fear the bill is the first step in a Nation-wide universal repudiation.

In 4 years' time the policies of those who control the Republic, so far as money is concerned, have destroyed financially and economically tens of millions of our population. Today these citizens have nothing left. Eleven million are still unemployed. Counting 4 to the family, that means 44,000,000 men, women, and children tonight have no means of support. We have started in the reverse direction. We have destroyed largely the laboring people. We have destroyed the most of the farmers of the country. We have destroyed the little cities of the Nation. Yesterday we approved a program that I fear will destroy the only substantial citizens left, and those are the holders of bonds.

Mr. President, I hear complaints against the banks for not making loans. Banks cannot make safe loans today, save on Government bonds. There is nothing else that is productive today, nothing else that is sound economically. Banks cannot make loans on farms or loans to farmers.

They cannot make loans on railroads. They cannot make loans on closed factories. They cannot make individual loans to the public because the people have no security. Most of our property is still nonproductive of profits, and without profits no property is safe and sound for loans.

Under present conditions the banks cannot make loans. I do not blame the banks. When someone complains to me about the banks not making loans I answer their complaint with a question. I say to them, "If you had $1,000,000 on what would you lend that million dollars?" They tell me they would lend it on Government bonds. That is exactly what the banks are doing, and other surplus funds in the hands of the banks are being invested in the purchase of Government bonds.

The banks do not lend their own money. They are lending the money of their depositors. Banks are nothing more than guardians and trustees of the deposits of their customers. The individual can lend his own money and take a chance. The banks do not dare to take a chance. They must be certain when they make a loan that they will not only get the principal back, but that they will get the interest, which is their profit.

Today the banks have no place to put their money save in Government bonds. From the standpoint of some, perhaps, that is a desirable situation. If I had to negotiate the sale of billions of bonds and the banks had no other place to put their money except in my bonds, I might be inclined to keep the banks in that condition until I had finished my financing. But what about the effect upon the country? The banks now in many places throughout the country are practically liquid. The First National Bank of Englewood, Ill., I believe it is, advertises in the papers that that bank is 100-percent liquid. It can pay every depositor in full 100 percent. It has a small amount of cash in the vault, it has sight exchange, and it has Government bonds totaling, the cash and the sight exchange and the bonds, more than the total deposits. That bank, if it can find a market for its bonds, can liquidate tomorrow and pay every depositor in full.

Every bank in the country is trying to follow that program. Let me suggest to those who are traveling in reverse what may happen when the banks have placed all their surplus money in bonds. They cannot buy any more bonds then. Their portfolios will be full of bonds but their cash will be exhausted. When the banks buy all the bonds their deposits will permit, then what may happen? They cannot buy more bonds, but there will be bonds which must find buyers.

Here in Washington we are issuing bonds by the billions, and the banks are the main source of sale for those bonds. The time may soon come when the banks will be loaded to the hilt with Government bonds. When that time comes the banks cannot buy any more bonds. Those who sell bonds now to the banks will not be able to sell them any more. When that time comes there will be no more sales of bonds to the banks unless, perchance, the banks begin to hypothecate their bonds with the Federal Reserve banks and borrow funds to buy more bonds.

But that is pyramiding. The moment the banks of America start to pyramid their loans, the wise bankers will say, "That is not sound banking. That is not good business. We will quietly commence cashing in our bonds and we will not be caught in a bond slump like the holders of stocks were caught in 1929 in the stock crash." There are many wise bankers; and when this policy of selling bonds quietly under cover to get out from under a possible bond crash is once instituted, in what condition will Senators expect to find the bond market? There will be no buyers of bonds. No one will have any money. The public has not money to buy bonds. The banks will have no money. Then we may look forward to seeing a slump, a crash, in the bond market of this country.

Mr. President, during the war we had what was called inflation. Just after the war we had what was called deflation. In 1928 and 1929 we had what some people called inflation of bank deposits for the purpose of enabling the stock market to operate efficiently and profitably. Now we are having what I term an inflation of the issuance of bonds; and, as I said a moment ago, I fear that we are running into an inflation of bonds to such an extent, which all real inflation eventually results in, that we will have a bond slump or a bond crash in the not-distant future.

But, Mr. President, I do not intend at this time to discuss this amendment at any greater length, except to explain how it comes to be here.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I was wondering why the Senator did not offer as an amendment the bill that came out of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am coming to that right now, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. LONG. May I ask whether the Senator would have any serious objection to substituting the agricultural bill for this amendment?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. When I complete my statement I think there will be no questions to be asked upon that subject at this time.

Mr. President, of course, it is patent that the Senate could not pass upon an amendment of this length without having the amendment printed and before it for consideration. Let me state what transpired on the silver question during this session of Congress.

The House passed what is known as the "Dies bill." The Dies bill was passed by a majority of 2 or 3 to 1 in the House of Representatives. The Dies bill proposes to have a Federal agency begin to negotiate for the sale or trade of surplus agricultural products for silver. In other words, the original Dies bill proposed to have a special commission begin to offer surplus cotton and surplus wheat in the markets of the world in exchange for silver at a premium of not less than 10 percent and not more than 25 percent above the world market price of silver.

The bill passed the House of Representatives and came to this body. The bill was labeled "A bill for the stimulation of the sale or exchange of surplus agricultural products." It is a farm-relief measure. In fairness to others who might not understand the matter, at my request and by unanimous consent the bill was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, because that is the committee which is responsible for legislation affecting agriculture.

The bill, as I have stated, went to the Agricultural Committee. The committee held hearings upon the bill. It was discovered that we have many viewpoints on the money question and many viewpoints on the silver question. There is in the House a bill, called the Fiesinger bill, which proposes to add to our reserves in the Federal Treasury silver on the basis of the value of the silver. In other words, we acquire silver by accepting it or buying it at its value, and carrying the silver as bullion at its value—not 371¼ grains to the dollar but so much an ounce, whatever it is worth.

The Agricultural Committee, after hearings on the bill and after consideration, reported out the Dies bill, with some amendments. We provided that the export-import bank should be the agency for the exchange of our products for silver. The committee added a second provision to the bill authorizing and directing that all monetary silver bullion in this country be nationalized; in other words, condemned and possession taken over by the Government. It provided that all monetary silver in the United States should be taken over and placed in our Treasury, and that silver certificates should be issued against such silver. It provided, third, that the Secretary of the Treasury should be authorized and directed to go into the open market of the world and begin to buy silver, the theory being, of course, first, to increase the silver in the Treasury of the United States; and, second, to increase the circulation by the issuance of silver certificates against such silver.

Mr. President, it was the action of the Agricultural Committee on the Dies bill which brought the silver question before the Senate.

I think I shall violate no confidence by stating that a number of Senators went down to a very important office in Washington for a conference. The conference developed certain ideas and brought forth certain suggestions. Some of those suggestions and ideas were somewhat at variance with the provisions of the amendment reported by the Agricultural Committee.

I will state further that another conference was arranged for this afternoon at the same office; but, owing to the fact that one member of the delegation who desired to be included is out of town and will not return until tomorrow, and another member is ill as I understand, the conference was postponed until tomorrow; and it is understood now that a conference is to be held tomorrow in a very important branch of the Government upon this identical question.

The amendment I have just offered to this bill is not the amendment submitted by the Agricultural Committee. It is an amendment having for its basis the Agricultural Committee amendment, but with modifications to meet the views of certain groups in the Congress—one the Fiesinger group in the House of Representatives, and other groups. So the amendment which is now pending before the Senate to the so-called "Glass bill" carries in the main the Dies bill. The export-import bank is authorized to negotiate the sale of surplus agricultural products abroad and also manufactured goods, and to receive from foreign buyers silver at a premium of not to exceed 25 percent and not less than 10 percent; which probably means 10 percent. We accept that silver for what it costs, plus the premium, in exchange for our surplus goods. The agricultural bill provided for the transfer of farm products only. I have added to my amendment—for the purposes of designating the two, I call it my amendment—that we shall exchange manufactured goods, as well as farm products, for foreign silver.

So the amendment now before the Senate provides for the exchange for silver of agricultural products that we do not need, and likewise for manufactured goods that we do not need. We are going to trade surplus farm products and surplus manufactured goods for silver, and trade for silver on the basis of the world price of silver plus a premium of not less than 10 percent and not more than 25 percent; and the export-import bank will have charge of this Federal activity.

It is thought that if this measure should pass, and the House likewise thought so, we could exchange and dispose of a large amount of our cotton and our wheat and our corn and our livestock to foreign silver-using nations in exchange for their silver. Spot silver is now some 41½ cents per fine ounce in the world market. Assuming a premium of 10 percent, we will add some 4 cents and then issue silver certificates against the silver for the price for which we accepted it, the world price plus the premium fixed. In that particular this amendment is different from the one reported from the Agricultural Committee. That amendment provided that we should issue certificates against the silver on the basis of $1.29 an ounce, and pay out the portion that we have to pay for the silver, and put the balance in the Treasury as profit. This amendment puts the silver in the Treasury, issues certificates only to the extent of what it costs us, and then if silver hereafter goes up we will make the profit; and the effect is the same, except that we do not now issue certificates against the silver in excess of its world market value plus the premium fixed.

That is the proposal carried in this amendment. It is the Dies bill modified, as I think and as some others think, to make it workable.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The amendment which the Senator has offered is somewhat voluminous. It was read at the desk, but, as the Senator well understands, it is always difficult, and sometimes impossible, to follow the reading on account of the conditions which prevail in the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes. I was trying to explain the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Has the amendment been considered by any standing committee of the Senate?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The amendment in the main has been considered by a standing committee of the Senate, but it has a few modifications; and I do not offer it as the measure reported out by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It is substantially the same, and I was seeking to point out the differences. I think the differences will be satisfactory to those in our committee who were not enthusiastically for the measure because of the very things that have been changed since.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. This particular amendment, however, has not been considered by any standing committee?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Not as proposed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And the bill a portion of which is incorporated in the amendment has been considered by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Since, as stated by the Senator, the proposed legislation is expected to affect materially agriculture, it is, of course, proper that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry should consider it; but since it also relates to matters that are usually held to be within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and since also the amendment appears to be of very far-reaching consequence, does not the Senator feel that it should be considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I do not want to have to repeat some of the speeches I have been making on this question for the past 5 years.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If my question is going to compel the Senator to do that, I will withdraw it. [Laughter.] I really thought, however, that perhaps the Senator could answer my question without a prolonged speech.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that I was getting to that point.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Are any copies of the amendment available?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I have given out all the copies I have. The amendment will be printed, of course, and on the desks of Senators in the morning.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LONG. To avoid any complication about the matter with those of us who have been trying to get this silver legislation through, I wonder if the Senator would consider allowing me to offer the agricultural bill as an amendment, and then offer his amendment as an amendment to the agricultural amendment, for the reason I am about to state.

The bill as reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry at least is supposed to be a studied bill, so that the differences might be pointed out to the Senator. I will say to the Senator that I have no objection to voting for his amendment, but I do not want the air beclouded by the thought that the committee has not given proper study to the question and that we are not offering something that has not been considered by the committee.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Let me say to the Senator from Louisiana that the changes in this amendment which were not included in the committee amendment have been included solely for one purpose; that is, to get the ideas of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. LONG. I see what the Senator is trying to do. I know the Senator is seeking to accomplish what he has stated, but I know that the Senator is mellowing the bill which probably he, and others like us, should like to have. What I want to do is to place the agricultural amendment before the Senate, if I can. I do not want to offer it as an amendment to the Senator's amendment. I would prefer, if the Senator would allow me, to offer it, and then for him to offer his amendment as a substitute. I believe, from the point of strategy of the silverites, that would be better.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I appreciate the suggestion made by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, and between now and the time when the amendment will come before the Senate for a vote, probably this particular point will have proper consideration.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The first part of the amendment has to do with the Dies bill.

The second part proposes to nationalizze silver; that is, domestic silver—silver domiciled within the United States.

It is thought that there is in this country only about 175,000,000 ounces of silver. Dr. Goldenweiser, chief economist of the Federal Reserve System, testified before our committee, and placed in the record a statement as to the world's supply of silver, and where it is located. He estimated that the total amount of silver in the United States is 175,000,000 ounces, which, at 50 cents an ounce, would be worth just half that sum—$87,500,000—just about enough money to run the United States for 4 days. So there could be no harm done by taking over $87,000,000 worth of silver and cleaning out the silver market, and the silver surplus about which we hear so much.

I noticed in today's paper a statement by a former distinguished fellow servant of this Government, but now a distinguished writer, the editor of a newly created magazine, to the effect that he is against the present silver movement, because he is afraid that the world's silver would gravitate toward the United States, and the people would be forced to wade knee-deep in silver dollars. That is the implication; he did not put it in those words.

Mr. President, the silver surplus is one of the myths which confuse the people of this country, that the world is surfeited with silver. The best estimates which can be secured, and they are from the Federal Reserve Board and the Director of the Mint, show that only about 15,500,000,000 ounces of silver have been produced since the discovery of America in 1492. Fifteen billion five hundred million ounces of silver are all that have been produced since Columbus landed in America.

Of that amount much has been lost, much has been used in the arts, and today we can account for only 9,400,000,000 ounces of silver which is susceptible of being used for money. The balance has been used in jewelry, in tableware, in the arts, and in motion-picture films.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LONG. According to the Senator's statement, about the worst inflation we could get would be around four or five billion dollars in silver money.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I will come to that in just a moment. The Senator is exaggerating the amount.

I make the statement that the Federal Reserve Board and the Director of the Mint—and those are the best authorities we have—report that there have been only 15,500,000,000 ounces of silver produced in the world since Columbus discovered America. Of that sum we can now locate only some 9,400,000,000 ounces. British India has 4,700,000,000 ounces of that silver, China has 2,500,000,000 ounces. Add those two figures together, and we find 7,200,000,000 ounces of silver in British India and China alone. That leaves only 2,400,000,000 ounces of silver outside of China and British India. Other nations have silver. We have $840,000,000 in silver, but not that many ounces. We have 540,000,000 silver dollars, but they are not worth $540,000,000. They are worth less than $200,000,000 in paper currency. We have $300,000,000 in minor coins—50-cent pieces, quarters, and dimes. They are worth even less proportionally because they are not full weight in proportion to their stamped value. Our total supply of silver money in the sum of $840,000,000, if melted into silver bullion, would be worth less than $300,000,000 in paper currency. In monetary silver we have less than 700,000,000 ounces. Add this amount to the 7,200,000,000 and the amount is less than 8,000,000,000 ounces of silver located in the three countries—British India, China, and the United States.

Where is the balance of the silver? There is only some 1,400,000 ounces left. It is located in Mexico, in South America, and in the other countries of the world. England has some silver, France has some silver, Italy has some silver, likewise the other nations of the world hold small amounts of the white metal. If any figures and estimates are correct, then there is only a small amount of floating silver monetary metal in the entire world. We have 175,000,000 ounces of it, by far the largest part of surplus silver among all the nations of the world.

Our reserves today are practically in gold. Silver plays little part in the reserves of the Treasury, and plays no more part in the reserves of the banks than do greenbacks. They are on a par. The silver dollar and the greenback dollar are both token money. The greenback dollar is worth something as paper. The silver dollar is worth something as bullion—little more than paper. But the silver in the dollar is worth only about 35 cents. The silver in the dollar is not worth a hundred cents. If silver were worth $1.29 an ounce, the silver in the dollar would be worth a dollar, but when silver is worth only 41 cents an ounce, the silver in the dollar is worth only about 35 cents.

Mr. LONG. Thirty-two cents.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Thirty-two cents, the Senator says. As I stated, in these discussions it has been developed that our total reserves are in gold. The Constitution provides that Congress shall coin money and regulate its value. The Constitution places the responsibility of the money question upon the Congress of the United States, and we cannot divest ourselves of the responsibility. We can create agencies to deal with money, but all the time these agencies operate they represent the Congress. For whatever the agency does, Congress is responsible. If the agency acts, the Congress is responsible for the act, the same as in law a principal is responsible for the act of his agent. If the agent fails to act, that does not relieve the Congress of its responsibility.

Silver has been used as money for a good many thousand years. The first dollar we had in the United States was of silver. In 1783, I think it was, Alexander Hamilton made a study of the money question in order to make a report to the first administration. His ideas are contained in his report to the administration on the establishment of the mint, and in 1792 Congress accepted the report of Mr. Hamilton and authorized the creation of a dollar out of 371¼ grains of silver, and that dollar, prescribed by Hamilton, was officially proclaimed by act of Congress in 1792, and has been the standard silver dollar from that day to this.

The number of grains in the silver dollar has not been changed since Hamilton's time. The number of grains in the gold dollar has been changed three or four times. It was changed in 1834. The number of grains in the gold dollar again was changed in 1837, and again changed in 1933.

The discussions have disclosed the desirability of using silver in addition to gold as a part of our monetary reserve. That idea originated at the London Conference. It was suggested there that the nations of the world use 70 or 75 percent of gold back of their currencies, and 25 percent of silver, in value with a 5-percent permissive, which meant that they could have as much as 30 percent of their reserves in silver and 70 percent in gold.

I have, therefore, added to my amendment, in addition to what the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry recommended, a provision that we use both gold and silver as standard money in the United States, that we should use 70 percent of gold in the reserves, that we should make up our reserves by using 70 percent of gold and 30 percent of silver. That is according to the idea advanced at the London conference. It is according to the idea suggested at a most important conference recently, where it was decided that it would not be unsound, from a monetary standpoint, to have 30 percent of the reserves in silver and 70 percent in gold.

Now, I want to show the Senate, if I may, very briefly, what the result would be if we did use 30 percent in silver. At the present time we have $7,755,000,000 in gold in the Treasury of the United States. That might be termed the 70 percent, because that gold now is all in the nature of a Federal National Treasury reserve—$7,755,000,000. If we constitute our total reserves at 100 percent, and this $7,755,000,000 in gold is the 70 percent, then we could add the 30 percent in silver. That 30 percent will make it necessary for us to have in our Treasury $3,323,000,000 in silver in value. We have now $640,000,000 in silver, but in value only some $300,000,000.

If we should follow that formula, Mr. President, and decide to increase our reserves and make them 30-percent silver and 70 percent in gold, we would have to secure silver to the total value of $3,323,000,000 to make up those reserves.

Silver now is some 41 cents an ounce. Conceding that it might rise to 50 cents an ounce, in order to secure enough silver bullion to be worth such sum of $3,323,000,000 we would have to purchase over 5,000,000,000 ounces of silver. Where are we going to get it? Available silver does not exist in the world. I doubt most seriously if we could buy as much as 1,000,000,000 ounces of silver without running the price far above the parity price of $1.29 per ounce under the old 16 to 1 ratio.

There is absolutely no danger of getting a flood of silver in America. The silver does not exist, unless we concede, perchance, that China is going to send her silver here, that British India is going to send her silver here—a thing unthinkable. It is the only money they have, those hundreds of millions of people in the Orient. They have no paper currency and few banks. What they have is silver chunks and silver coin. That is the thing they prize and the thing they hoard.

With silver going up, does anyone think they would sell? They would want to get more. They would be in competition with America to get silver.

So there is no chance, Mr. President, of securing, in my estimation, this 30 percent for our reserves in silver. Set that as our goal; we cannot attain it; we cannot get the silver. So there can be no danger.

Mr. President, the hour is late, and I did not expect to make any extended speech at this time. I ask unanimous consent that this amendment be printed in bill form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed in bill form as well as in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, inasmuch as a conference has been arranged with a most responsible governmental agency for tomorrow, I think it is only fair to suggest that this amendment be considered as pending, be printed for the further consideration of the Senate, and for the further consideration of those who feel a responsibility for our monetary problem.

The conference tomorrow may develop something, and again it may not. If it does, this amendment could be changed or modified to carry out any agreement that might be reached.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I was wondering if the Senator would not withdraw this amendment as an amendment to this particular bill and attach it to a bill which we are going to report out next week with respect to industrial loans along the lines of the present Glass bill, except that they would be made through the R.F.C. rather than through the Federal Reserve bank?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The bill under consideration deals with the Federal Reserve banks; my amendment deals with the reserves of the Federal Reserve banks and the reserves of the Treasury itself. In my opinion, my amendment is germane to this bill, and I am not sure that it would be germane to the next bill. For the present I cannot agree to a withdrawal. I will say that tomorrow my viewpoint may change. I want to be helpful, and I am only asking for a reasonable time to make some investigations and report back here late tomorrow afternoon or the next day, and if that understanding can be had, I will promise the Senate that after another brief statement, perhaps, not long, I will be willing to have this amendment go to a vote, so far as I am concerned. Of course, if the matter is opposed, and I find a decision, or an implied conviction that nothing will be agreed to, I feel it my duty to give the country the reasons actuating some of us who believe that the money question is still unsettled and the most important issue before the people.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I should like to inquire of the Senator at what hour he expects to hold his conference tomorrow.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield to the Senator from Utah to answer that question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I join in the request which has been submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma. In view of the amendment he has offered, and in view of the fact that an arrangement has been made for a conference tomorrow as indicated by the Senator, the hour of which has not yet been fixed, I believe there ought to be consent to the request he has submitted.

I am sure the conference will be held. I am hopeful that it will be productive of very beneficial results. We may not all agree as to the best method of attaining the objective. Some of us have never lost our faith in bimetallism and all that term implies. Some of us would be glad to see silver remonetized. Indeed, the Democratic Party pledged itself to the rehabilitation of silver. Rehabilitation means restoration, and implies the restoration of silver to its primary fundamental position as basic money.

I say some of us have not lost our devotion to that objective. I appreciate the fact that the situation presents factors which may warrant differences of opinion as to the best method to pursue; and I know efforts are being made to agree upon a program which may harmonize some differences and work out a measure which will meet the concurrence at least of a majority of the Members of both branches of Congress. The conference will be held sometime tomorrow. I cannot indicate just now the hour. I shall be very glad to confer with the Senator from Virginia and to indicate to him at the earliest possible moment at what hour the conference will be held, so that he may be advised as to the course which he desires to pursue with respect to the pending bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I have no idea of entering at this time, if at all, upon a discussion of the silver question. It is so foreign to the pending bill that I should regard it as a waste of my time to undertake to debate that problem, the pending bill being simply a banking bill to afford credits, essential loans, to going industries which are in great need of assistance.

I regret that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] could not be dissuaded from offering his amendment to this particular bill, because just to that extent of time he will be delaying this very essential assistance to the recovery of the industries of the country. If his further discussion of the bill is to depend upon his conference somewhere with somebody tomorrow, I venture to express the hope that the conference will be arranged as early in the day as possible, so that when the Senate shall convene tomorrow we may resume the consideration of the pending banking bill.

I have no objection, of course, to the bill going over until tomorrow with that end in view.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters, which were ordered to be placed on the calendar.

NOMINATIONS PASSED OVER

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar is in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest that the first two nominations on the calendar be passed over under arrangements which are well understood.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the first two nominations on the calendar will be passed over.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Guy C. Reeve to be United States marshal, southern district of Florida.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 2, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, DD., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, Thou who hast not set a limit to the richness of love, to the power of self-sacrifice, nor to the sublimity of purity, redeem us by the hallowing grace of our Savior. May we have a growing capacity for the moral life with its exalted standards. In the highest reaches of character, blessed Father, let us experience the satisfactions of a godly life. Let not our labor be just a simple compliance to duty, but an eager impulse which touches the spring of fidelity, honor, and honesty. Thou God of our people, Thou Shepherd of the roadside, guide us in all our uncertain ways. O breathe upon us the breath of the sanctuary, and may Thy name be known, loved, and honored among us. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 5950. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendment to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. NEELY, Mr. MCCARRAN, and Mr. AUSTIN to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXPLANATION OF VOTE

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. UNDERWOOD], was excused from attendance yesterday on account of important business. I am requested to state that if he had been present he would have voted "aye" on the motion to adopt the conference report on the tax bill, and also he would have voted "aye" on the motion to insist on the disagreement to the so-called "Couzens amendment", roll calls 134 and 135.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WOOD] be excused on account of death in his family.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

FIFTY-CENT PIECE IN COMMEMORATION OF THREE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF FOUNDING OF THE PROVINCE OF MARYLAND

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2966) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three-hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Province of Maryland.

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, Mr. Speaker, if this is going to bring about any debate, I will object.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. There is no debate, as far as I know.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOMERS]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Province of Maryland, there shall be coined by the Director of the Mint ten thousand 50-cent pieces of standard size, weight, and silver fineness and of a special appropriate design to be fixed by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be legal tender in all payments at face value.

SEC. 2. That the coins herein authorized shall be issued at par and only upon the request of the chairman or secretary of the Maryland Tercentenary Commission.

SEC. 3. Such coins may be disposed of at par or at a premium by said commission and all proceeds shall be used in furtherance of the Maryland Tercentenary Commission projects.

SEC. 4. That all laws now in force relating to the subsidiary silver coins of the United States and the coining or striking of the same; regulating and guarding the process of coinage; providing for the purchase of material, and for the transportation, distribution, and redemption of the coins; for the prevention of debasement or counterfeiting; for security of the coin; or for any other purposes, whether said laws are penal or otherwise, shall, so far as applicable, apply to the coinage herein directed.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-five"; after the word "thousand" in line 5, insert "silver"; in line 6, after the word "and" strike out "silver"; and in line 9, after the word "Treasury", strike out "to be legal tender in all payments at face value", and insert "but the United States shall not be subject to the expense of making the models for master dies or other preparations for this coinage."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment for the purpose of asking some questions. While we are striking out "10,000" and inserting "25,000", why not insert "100,000", and get that much more silver in circulation?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Of course, that might be a good argument to get more silver in circulation if more than 25,000 of these coins were in the habit of going into circulation. The committee took this up with the department and decided that 25,000 was about the proper number.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows from his experience with respect to such matters that most of these coins are immediately taken out of circulation. They are sold at a premium and they are put into somebody's memento box. I am willing for that to be done, but in order to get about 75,000 in actual circulation, so that the people will have a 50-cent piece in their pockets once in a while, why not increase it to 100,000?

Mr SOMERS of New York. Unfortunately, the history of these coins has been that they never go into circulation.

Mr. BLANTON. I know, but I want to put some of them in circulation.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I do not know of any method compelling that. If I did, I would be glad to amend the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MEMORIAL SERVICES, MARQUIS DE LA FAYETTE

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Concurrent Resolution No. 37, a rather urgent matter.

The Clerk read, as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 37

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the death of Gilbert du Motier, Marquis de La Fayette, the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 11 o'clock antemeridian, on Sunday, May 20, 1934.

That a joint committee consisting of 5 Members of the House of Representatives and 5 Members of the Senate shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, respectively, which is empowered to make suitable arrangements for fitting and proper exercises for the joint session of Congress herein authorized.

That invitations to attend the exercises be extended to the President of the United States and the members of his Cabinet, the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Diplomatic Corps (through the Secretary of State), the General of the Armies, the Chief of Staff of the Army, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Major General Commandant of the Marine Corps, and the Commandant of the Coast Guard, and such other persons as the joint committee on arrangements shall deem proper.

That the President of the United States is hereby invited to address the American people at the joint session of the Congress in commemoration of the centennial anniversary of the death of General La Fayette.

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, what is this for?

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is a privileged report from the committee.

Mr. SNELL. I understand that. Will the gentleman tell us what it is for?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I imagine that most Members of the House are familiar with the purpose of this celebration. Sometime ago a select committee was appointed.

Mr. SNELL. Does this mean another select committee is to be appointed?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no. This is simply carrying out the existing arrangements for the celebration of the anniversary of the death of General La Fayette. It simply authorizes this committee to carry out the program that has already been arranged. The invitations have already been printed and are waiting to be sent out. It is merely a formal authorization for the conduct of the service.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The date of this memorial service contemplates, of course, that Congress will be in session on May 20?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is on Sunday, May 20.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not intended that these memorial services shall occur after sine die adjournment, is it? The purpose of my inquiry is this: The House is practically through with its business. Is there any reason why we should be kept here until May 20 or until the 1st of June, that the gentleman knows of, unless it is some purposed delay of somebody somewhere? Why can we not get through with the business of Congress and go home?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I may say in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Texas that I am just as anxious as he or any other Member to get through the program of the House, and I hope that we can do it as expeditiously as possible. Of course, if the House should not be in session at that time, only those Members could attend who were in the city; but I say to the gentleman in all candor that in my opinion it will be physically impossible for this session of Congress to adjourn by the 20th of May.

Mr. BLANTON. The point of my inquiry is this: Cannot we, 435 Members, aided by the Speaker, the majority leader, the minority leader, and the great Chairman of the great Rules Committee, begin kindling some fires that will burn up all obstacles standing between us and an early adjournment? It looks as though we should get away from here by the end of this month, and I think we ought to start the program now so that we can get away.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the gentleman will agree with me that as far as the organization of the House is concerned, it is proceeding with as much expedition as possible to conclude the program. The Committee on Rules is having practically daily sessions to authorize the consideration of bills that are urgent.

Mr. BLANTON. And some of them are very unimportant.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There may be some difference of opinion about that.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. I am in entire accord with what the gentleman from Alabama has just stated. I would like to know upon whose authority the gentleman from Texas states that the House is through with its business.

Mr. BLANTON. I said we were practically through; and we are practically through. We have passed all of the supply bills and we are waiting on the Senate.

Mr. TRUAX. I do not agree with the gentleman from Texas. We should take up and consider the Frazier bill, the McLeod bill, and a number of other pieces of important legislation.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am interested in what the gentleman said about the physical impossibility of adjourning by the 20th of May.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Perhaps the word "physical" was used improvidently. There might be some other considerations in the matter.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does not the gentleman believe that the date of adjournment will be nearer June 15?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not a prophet; I would not undertake to hazard a guess about that. The gentleman from Illinois knows there is considerable reported legislation that has not been disposed of.

Mr. BRITTEN. There is a lot of it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If things take their ordinary course, I am not at all sure that we are going to be here until the 15th of June, but I feel reasonably confident that it will be impossible to adjourn this session of Congress by the 20th of May. This is my own personal opinion only, although I trust I may be mistaken.

Mr. SNELL. A lot of people feel the same way.

Mr. BLANTON. If we could just keep the necessity for an early adjournment before us daily, we may get an adjournment by the latter part of this month, and I know that it would be to the best interests of the people.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The House concurrent resolution was adopted.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I shall object.

Mr. FREAR. Then I shall make the point of order there is not a quorum present. I ask but a very brief time to say a word on an important matter.

Mr. RAYBURN. I regret that I have to object, but I must do so to keep faith with others. Half a dozen Members have made similar requests of me this morning, and I told them I would have to object; so to adhere to my word to them I must object in this case also.

Mr. FREAR. I think the gentleman would not object if he understood the matter.

Mr. RAYBURN. I must keep my word to the other Members.

FEDERAL ALCOHOL CONTROL ADMINISTRATION

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, at the request of my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], I ask unanimous consent that he may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include therein a copy of a protest against the Federal alcohol-control legislation filed with the President and signed by 12 Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following protest against the Federal alcohol control legislation filed with the President and signed by 12 Members of the House:

The Federal Alcohol Control Administration was set up by Executive order of President Roosevelt, by virtue of authority vested in him under title I of the National Recovery Administration. It was to be an interim administration for the purpose of making investigation and study relative to the coordination of the activities of the Government pertaining to taxation, control, and regulation of alcoholic beverages, as well as to the exercise of such powers vested in it by any code of fair competition under the N.R.A. and the A.A.A. The setting up of the F.A.C.A. was not recommended by the Interdepartment Committee—composed of important officials of the Treasury Department, the Departments of State, Commerce, Justice, and Agriculture, and the Tariff Commission. A number of the members of this committee actively opposed the establishment of such a bureau.

The F.A.C.A., in the short space of time that it has functioned, has gone beyond the purposes for which it was established. It has interfered with the orderly and natural growth of the reborn liquor industry. It has encroached upon the activities of the Bureau of Customs, the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the Bureau of Pure Food and Drugs of the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of Justice and other agencies of the Government. It has thereby created a great deal of ill will among members of the liquor industry and among the officials of these departments.

It was plainly the purpose of the administration, in the promulgation of codes under the N.R.A. and the A.A.A., to allow industries to fashion their own codes and to govern themselves. However, this purpose has been frustrated. The various integers of the liquor industry were not permitted to draft their own codes. The F.A.C.A. forced upon them most rigid and unfair provisions. The F.A.C.A. brooked no opposition.

There has thus been thrust upon the industry a sort of superpower called the "F.A.C.A." There is no appeal from the decisions of the F.A.C.A. There is no provision for judicial review. Its edicts are final. This intense bureaucratic control of the industry has placed it in a sort of strait-jacket.

Regulations that are most burdensome have made it difficult for the legitimate trader to function and quite easy for the bootlegger and illegitimate trader to prosper. This superpower, the F.A.C.A., now decides who may manufacture, import, rectify, and wholesale, and to what extent. This is done by an elaborate system of quotas and permits. The legal basis for this procedure is doubtful.

One may ask to what length the Government intends to go in the matter of control of the market and the abolition of competition, as well as the setting up of a permit system which was supposedly eliminated by repeal.

Under the N.R.A., the President may invoke the license, permitting a business to function, but he can do this only when he can find "destructive wage or price cutting." This power is drastic and far-reaching. The President has not seen fit as yet to use it in any industry. Nevertheless, the F.A.C.A. has the temerity to use the license or permit system in the liquor industry. It may point to its power under the codes. That power, however, was forced upon an unwilling industry. Not even the famous consent-in-advance theory can justify it.

Congress recognized that this power of license was too drastic and limited the President's authority in that regard to a single year—until July 16 next. Even General Johnson has announced, wisely, that the licensing power shall be allowed to expire.

The license or permit system in the liquor industry must also terminate. It has no vestige of right to existence.

Industry dare not complain. Applicants fear that complaints will cut down their quotas, impair their permits and generally prejudice them in their relations with the administration.

Members of Congress have not been treated courteously, officials of the F.A.C.A. are inaccessible, telephone calls are disregarded, written communications are either ignored or answers thereto are delayed unduly. Members of Congress have been denied the right to petition the Chairman-Director of the F.A.C.A. to register complaints.

This protest is made with no desire to impugn the motives or sincerity of anyone connected with the F.A.C.A. We disagree with its policies, not with personalities. The system must be changed.

When the people voted for repeal of the eighteenth amendment they wished to get the Government out of the liquor business. Control was to be returned to the States. Under the F.A.C.A. and the codes that it has forced upon the industry, the Federal Government is in the liquor business almost as much as before. Contrary to the Democratic platform, the Government is not relegating control back to the States.

The Federal Government should only be interested in its customs, the protection of its revenue, and the protection of dry States. The dry States are still protected under the Webb-Kenyon Act, the Wilson Original Packages Act, the Reed bone-dry amendment, and the provisions of the Cullen law. There should be the least possible interference in the regulation of the industry by the Government, and the codes must be applied more liberally.

The F.A.C.A. was to be an interim affair. However, the industry is well on its way. About 520,000 gallons of beverage spirits are being distilled daily. There are 333 rectifying plants. There are 600 breweries, producing almost 3,000,000 gallons of beer daily. There are 710 wineries, 5,400 wholesale liquor dealers, 165,000 retail liquor dealers, and 182,000 retail beer dealers. This is no longer an interim affair. In all likelihood, over 1,500,000 persons are directly and indirectly employed. It is one of the greatest recoveries in the national recovery era. This business, therefore, is entitled to permanent State control and not an interim Federal control.

On March 5, President Roosevelt in his speech to the general N.R.A. conference, in part said: "Antitrust laws must continue in their major purpose of retaining competition and preventing monopoly." Yet in the allocation of quotas of Scotch whisky, it is admitted that the F.A.C.A. gave decided preference to the brands of the British whisky trust, called the Distillers Corporation, Ltd. It has, however, been indicated by responsible persons that 50 percent of the Scotch whisky was allocated to representatives of the British trust. This is indeed a far cry from the text of President Roosevelt's address concerning the discouragement of monopolies.

Many importers, through no fault of their own, particularly during the second period, were granted no quotas of wines or liquors. In numerous instances, it is admitted by the F.A.C.A. that the applications were in order, but that through oversight or inability to cope with the tremendous amount of work placed upon it, or due even to negligence of employees, these applications were not passed upon prior to a given date. In other words, through no fault of their own, these importers were deprived of the quotas to which they were entitled. The F.A.C.A., however, was obdurate to all protests. No relief, whatsoever, was afforded, although the F.A.C.A. admitted that in numerous cases injustice had been done.

The F.A.C.A. has been guilty of setting up foolish, piddling, and annoying regulations, due to the fact, very likely, that some of the members of the F.A.C.A. have no knowledge of the business. In their misguided enthusiasm, they have foisted upon the industry, regulations that have no real relation to the needs and exigencies governing the trade. For example:

1. It is ruled that an importer cannot sell brandy or wine to a mincemeat manufacturer. This is a trifling regulation that only can cause annoyance, and is of no real value to anyone.

2. From time immemorial the trade has used what is known as bottles of one fifth size; that is, containing one fifth of a gallon. In an endeavor to regulate the drinking habits of the Nation and for the purpose of discouraging the use of fifths, the F.A.C.A. has ruled that all bottles must be labeled in accordance with contents in terms of quarts. If a bottle, for example, contains 1 pint 9 ounces (and the pure food and drug law would require that the label contain the legend "1 pint 9 ounces"), the new regulations of the F.A.C.A. require that the label contain the legend "twenty-five thirty-seconds of a quart." This fraction of a quart conveys no real information to the consumer, whereas the term 1 pint 9 ounces does. This regulation is manifestly foolish and annoying.

3. This regulation, however, the F.A.C.A. has declared shall apply to cognac and distilled spirits, but need not apply to wines. Why this distinction is made is difficult to understand.

4. The trade has been labeling its products under the pure food and drug law and the internal revenue law. The F.A.C.A. changed these laws, by what right it is difficult to understand. It is not above the Treasury nor the Department of Agriculture. Furthermore, the trade was given an insufferably short period to adjust itself to its regulations. The domestic manufacturers were given 30 days originally and the importers 60 days. One concern suffered, it is reported, a loss of $400,000 due to the oversupply of cartons, bottles, and labels banned by the regulation, since no proper time of grace was given within which to use these supplies. Only after the greatest effort was the time extended, and then for only a comparatively brief period. No consideration was given to the fact that some of the imported goods were on tramp steamers coming from places as distant as Italy and Russia, where it would be impossible to effect such changes in 60 days. Here again it is charged and protested that the regulations were made without knowledge of the industry or the calling in of experts for advice.

5. The F.A.C.A. issued a regulation to the effect that straight whisky could not be bottled by a rectifier. Only the distiller could bottle straight whisky. This restriction was most onerous as far as the small dealer was concerned. President Roosevelt, and all sane-minded persons desire that pure, wholesome straight whisky be made available as widely and as cheaply as possible. Playing into the hands of the distillers in this fashion prevents wide distribution of good, wholesome, straight whisky, and discriminates against the small rectifier and wholesaler.

6. Although the F.A.C.A. has been in existence only a few months, it has issued a large number of regulations and press releases. Each one of them makes it more difficult for the small merchant to function. He cannot come from distant parts to Washington to register complaints and get relief. He cannot afford to hire lawyers. These voluminous regulations increase the cost of doing business. This cost is passed on to the consumer.

7. These rigid regulations, furthermore, give aid and comfort to the bootlegger, who can easily avoid the regulations due to inability and failure of enforcement, whereas the legitimate trader must live up to them. The F.A.C.A. cannot enforce its regulations. It has no power. It has not even an investigational force. We thought we had destroyed the rum rows along our seacoast. It is noted that rum row lives again. St. Michelien has again become a haven of rum runners and smugglers. It is reported that huge supplies of liquor destined for United States bootleggers are warehoused there. Smuggling, particularly as a result of rigid quota regulations, has increased tremendously. Only due to vehement protests were quotas for the third period lifted. They must be abolished entirely. They serve no good purpose. They encourage smuggling.

8. A regulation was issued requiring any State that had set up a liquor-control board and was in the liquor business to obtain, first, a permit before it could import from abroad. This applied to States like Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Montana, Oregon, and Washington. It is difficult to understand by what right any bureau of the Government could thus encroach upon the sovereignty of any Commonwealth. It only serves to indicate to what extremes the F.A.C.A. has gone in the exercise of its alleged authority.

This protest and criticism is made in the hope that beneficial changes will result. Either the F.A.C.A. must be abolished or it must be reorganized. It must, in any event, be responsive to the reasonable requests of Members of Congress, and instructions must be given that Members of Congress be treated with uniform courtesy and prompt attention. Furthermore, the F.A.C.A. must recede from its position of a supergovernmental agency. It must do away with the system of permits. It shall not say who may or who may not go into the liquor business. That is a matter for the States. Codes must be changed to give back to the trade the right to govern itself.

FEDERAL AID FOR A NEW AMERICAN DIRIGIBLE

Mr. CONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short bill I introduced 2 weeks ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONDON. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I introduced a bill authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make a loan for the construction and operation of airships in overseas trade, the provisions of which are as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of fostering the American airship industry and to promote American overseas trade with use of commercial airships, to be available in time of war, to encourage American design, construction, and operation of airships, to demonstrate the value and profit of overseas airship service thus to promote its extension with private capital, and to provide immediate employment in airship construction, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to lend the sum of $12,000,000 to the Respess Aeronautical Engineering Corporation for the purpose of constructing an airship plant, an Atlantic operating terminal, two airships employing the new suspension-bridge-type structure and each having not less than 7,000,000 cubic feet gas capacity, and for operating these airships in commercial service from the United States to England or an European country. Such loan shall carry interest charges at the rate of 3½ percent per annum, which shall cumulate during the period of constructing and testing such airships, and shall remain a lien on the patents and patent rights and all present and subsequently acquired assets of the corporation until paid. Such loan, plus accumulated interest, shall be paid in 10 annual payments, the first payment to be made 3 years after the date of the enactment of this act.

FEDERAL AID FOR A NEW AMERICAN DIRIGIBLE

Mr. Speaker, this bill aims to promote the construction and operation of a new type of airship designed and developed by American inventive genius and engineering skill. This new airship is by no means an experiment but an assured success, having such superior structural advantages to the present rigid type of dirigible as to justify governmental financial assistance.

The purpose of this bill is not to give money out of the Treasury without recompense, nor even to subsidize private business as in the case of the air mail and the merchant marine, even though the operation of these new-type airships will be of great commercial benefit to the Nation as well as a valuable auxiliary in time of war. The bill merely seeks to afford to this new American enterprise a loan of money which in these times is not obtainable through the usual channels of investment. The loan is strictly a business transaction providing for an adequate interest return for the use of the money and the amortization of the loan in full within a period of 10 years. In addition the Treasury is fully secured by a first lien on all the patents and other assets of the borrowing corporation until the loan is paid.

The interest of our Government in the development of lighter-than-air craft is well known. We have spent millions of dollars on such airships as the Los Angeles, Akron, and Macon on the theory that this type of aircraft has a distinct military value. Notwithstanding unfortunate accidents to two ships, our naval officials are still convinced that these airships are well worth the expenditure of Government funds.

The country must therefore be vitally interested in any improvement of such airships in the direction of greater strength and safety, cheaper cost of construction and maintenance, wider range of use, and more efficiency and dependability in operation. Among other things these are some of the major advantages of this new type of American dirigible over the traditional German type as represented by the Macon.

The inventor of this new ship, Roland B. Respess, who has organized a corporation owned and controlled by him to develop his invention commercially, claims all of these advantages for his ship, and has demonstrated their existence to the satisfaction of outstanding engineers and experts in the construction of aircraft and aerial structures. He requests the Government to assist him in promoting the construction and operation of this airship, because the enterprise is one that is and should be of deep interest to us, not only from the standpoint of national defense but from a wise consideration of our commercial interests in foreign and domestic trade.

Because Mr. Respess is a resident of my State of Rhode Island I have had the privilege of learning from him and his consulting engineers the value and utility of his invention, and I am happy to have the opportunity to present his claims for governmental aid to the consideration of the Congress.

I lay no claim to an expert knowledge of either aviation or the construction of aircrafts, but I am satisfied that Mr. Respess has a proposition that deserves and should receive the serious consideration of the Federal Government. In my opinion Congress cannot afford to disregard this opportunity to promote an undoubted advance in airship construction by which our country can be placed in the forefront of air navigation by lighter-than-air craft.

All forward-looking nations are interested in navigation of the air by airships and their greater use in peace and war. The existing type of dirigible is not the last word in the development of the dirigible. Rather it is more in the nature of a pioneer in the field.

ADVANTAGES OF RESPESS NEW TYPE AIRSHIP

The Respess airship represents a tremendous advance in the construction of this type of aircraft. It comprises a number of distinct improvements, chief of which is its suspension-bridge type structure. This structure consists primarily in a rigid central member in the form of a tube which extends centrally from bow to stern. Attached to this central member are a series of transverse wheel-like frames, between which the gas bags are mounted, the diameter of each frame being determined by the contour of the airship in its particular position.

Flexibly mounted on and connected to the transverse frames are longitudinal steel wires which are continuous from bow to stern and fastened to the ends of the central member at the bow and stern. A similar set of wires are attached to the perimeters of the frames at an angle and serve to take up sheer loads. All the wires are of high-strength steel suspension-bridge type, tested and specially treated to resist corrosion.

Such structure composes a spar of predetermined dirigible form and size, with the longitudinal central member and the transverse wheel-like frames forming the body and the exterior wire hull functioning in the nature of a suspension bridge.

This structure is flexible to a degree that it is not possible to attain in the conventional rigid-frame airship, and is sufficiently rigid to insure this characteristic advantage which is desirable in flight. All wires or cables are in tension, and the entire structure is susceptible to exact calculation upon normal engineering principles and will develop far greater intrinsic strength with result in increased safety and length of service.

The familiar type of dirigible so well known to the public was developed in Germany and is now built with a frame of duralumin rings and girders. This frame is thin sheet material that is subject to rapid deterioration in service. The useful life of such a ship in regular crossing of the Atlantic must therefore be comparatively brief.

Another obstacle to the practical and regular use of the German dirigible on a commercially profitable basis is the high cost of fabrication of their structures, requiring, as it does, special tools, dies, equipment, and the hand assembly of millions of small parts. In addition to the obstacle of great cost, this type of structure is easily susceptible to serious and even disastrous accident if confronted with unusual weather conditions producing stresses of a severe nature in the framework of the ship.

This lack of the elements of safety and moderate cost has done much to retard the more widespread use of the airship in the last 10 years of greatly enlarged use of aircraft. The paramount question in the public mind is this matter of safety. Any improvement in the dirigible that will assure the public of the existence of this factor in lighter-than-air craft will undoubtedly result in the popularity of the airship, and especially so if such improvements result in a greatly lessened cost of construction so that it is economically profitable to build and operate a sufficient number of these ships for a regular Atlantic crossing service, and ultimately the Pacific.

The Respess airship meets these requirements fully, and ought to be built here by American workmen, and not permitted to go to England or elsewhere. Our country has always been foremost in the development of every new form of transportation. This was true of the steamship, the railroad, the automobile, and the airplane, and it ought to be true of the airship. The Federal Government by act of Congress has assisted in some of this past development, even to the extent of granting public funds and subsidies. In this instance merely a loan is asked.

Airship travel, it has been recently said, is an accepted fact. The Graf Zeppelin is about ready to resume her South Atlantic service from Germany to Brazil for her fourth season. This ship has made more than 60 crossings, and another and larger ship is under construction in Germany. Apparently that nation is determined to maintain her supremacy in this type of air navigation.

We have neglected this form of air travel too long. It is time, now that American inventors and engineers have designed a new type of dirigible of greatly increased safety and low cost of original construction and operation, for Congress to authorize the administration, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or other appropriate governmental agency, to give financial assistance to this new development.

Some years ago Congress made a move in the direction of possible future development of airship travel when it appropriated the sum of $11,000,000 for the segregation and conservation of large supplies of helium gas and declined to permit its sale to other nations. It then foresaw that airships would some day become a major form of overseas transportation, and it wisely sought to protect this valuable supply of helium against the day when it would be needed by American airships for national defense. With the building of this new type of American dirigible that day will have arrived, and the wisdom and foresight of Congress vindicated.

The development of the Respess airship has extended over a period of several years, during which time every point of novelty in the construction of the ship was checked and rechecked not only by the inventor but by consulting engineers of the foremost rank nationally and internationally. These experts have confirmed the inventor in his claim that he has tremendously improved upon the existing type of airship. They agree that the Respess ship will, after a brief experience in operation, convince the most skeptical that it is superior to the German dirigible and will inevitably make that type obsolete.

This experimentation and examination has been expensive but the inventor has furnished the funds for it out of his personal resources and now he asks for aid of the Government to put his project into actual operation because of the present dearth of private funds for investment, and because he believes, and rightly so, in my opinion, that our Government has an interest of a public nature in seeing that this advance in the use of lighter-than-air craft be made in America under American auspices.

This loan, if authorized by the passage of my bill, H.R. 9177, will be drawn upon as required for construction of the ship over a period of 2 years. It is intended to construct a manufacturing plant with a capacity sufficient for the construction of two of these airships at the same time; also an air field of large size, together with a terminal airship dock for the storage and repair of one airship. This airship dock will likewise be built on the principle of a suspension-bridge type of structure. These ships will both be larger than the Macon and yet be equal in cruising speed to the Macon's highest speed.

The proceeds of the loan after this work is completed will be employed in establishing a regular trans-Atlantic service to England over the great circle route from some advantageous point in New England. Based on experience in such trans-Atlantic service it is the hope to later provide Pacific service as well as a transcontinental service within the country, from coast to coast.

All of these plans have been carefully thought out and more consideration will be given them during the period of construction. Immediately upon the authorization of the loan the inventor and the borrowing corporation will definitely conclude present tentative plans for the site of the manufacturing plant which it is now agreed can best be established in a mild climate such as Florida or California.

I have felt it worth while to briefly state these facts in further explanation and support of H.R. 9177 to give the House a fairly complete idea of what is sought to be accomplished by this legislation and an idea as well of the merit of the proposal from the point of view of the Government. I hope the Committee on Banking and Currency, to whom the bill has been referred, will give it serious consideration and afford the inventor of this remarkable airship an opportunity to more fully present his claim for governmental recognition and financial aid.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation does not feel that it can undertake to make such a loan without the prior specific authorization of Congress. In this connection I hope the committee as well as Members of the House generally will consider the fact that a loan of $29,000,000 was made to the Pennsylvania Railroad to electrify its line from New York to Washington, to provide a more modern system of railroad transportation, and that it recently loaned to the New Haven Railroad the sum of $300,000 to purchase a new, single-unit, stream-line, diesel-engine-propelled train, for service on its line between Boston and Providence, to provide a speedier and more modern form of railroad passenger transportation. Neither of these loans are referred to in a spirit of criticism, but rather to show that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has generously loaned Government funds to finance new plans and new methods of transportation. These loans have been commended because they have helped to relieve unemployment and will enable the railroads to perform a higher quality of public service.

This bill, if enacted, will likewise afford substantial employment and besides supplying a new and more modern type of trans-Atlantic transportation it will establish a new and important industry in the manufacturing and servicing of these new airships with private capital. From every viewpoint, not only of foreign and domestic commerce but of national defense as well, this bill ought to receive serious consideration before this Congress adjourns.

SECURITIES EXCHANGE BILL

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I made the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my point of order, having been promised 2 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 9323) to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 9323, the securities exchange bill, with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and I ask that he may be permitted to speak out of order for the 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, a subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee with which I am acting has before it today, and will have the balance of the week, the question of community taxes. This is an important question.

The testimony has shown that eight States—not New York, not Illinois or Ohio, but eight other Western States—would pay $40,000,000 to $60,000,000 more annually for income taxes if they were put upon the same basis as the other 40 States. This is important. We have before us in that subcommittee today attorneys general from practically all the eight States and a number of other witnesses. There are Members here on the floor that came over there to be heard. I ask and extend the invitation to you, after talking with the chairman, Mr. SHALLENBERGER, to come there and testify as to what you believe in reference to the fairness or unfairness of the present system, or that we go on the same basis as those States. We invite you to come over there and give us your views.

There is a question of constitutionality, but we will not pass upon that. All of the attorneys from the Treasury Department, attorneys from the committee, and from the Attorney General's Department agree and say that it is proper to submit that question to the Supreme Court. I would like to have all of you who care to be heard come over there to the committee room and make any statement on the bill that will aid us, if you are interested in your State. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of legislation to regulate stock exchanges, and I am supporting this bill. I supported it in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as the members of that committee know. I am supporting this bill because, in my opinion, it is the only proposal that has been suggested to Congress at least that will effectively regulate stock exchanges.

I may say that I have studied the bill and the legislation so much that I have had little opportunity and no disposition to prepare or to make a formal speech on the subject. I am going to content myself with making some general observations about the legislation and then to discuss very informally some of the more important and controversial provisions of the bill.

At the outset, I should like to express my appreciation of the kindly reference of the gentleman from Texas [Mr.

RAYBURN], the chairman of the committee, to my work on the bill, and I should like to repeat here, what I have said in private conversation, that never since I have been on the committee have I known the entire committee to study a piece of legislation with more earnestness and with a keener sense of its responsibility than it has during the consideration of this legislation. The brunt of the attack against the bill has, of course, been borne by the chairman and he is entitled to the credit for having successfully piloted the bill through the committee. His ability and leadership in the committee and his steadfastness in resisting all amendments which would weaken the bill, have commanded the admiration of everyone who has kept in touch with the progress of the legislation.

I am in sympathy with the general purposes sought to be accomplished by the legislation, and I believe, as reported by the committee, it will have a tendency to accomplish those purposes, with a minimum of interference with legitimate business and industry, not excepting the business of the exchanges themselves, and with very little, if any, direct interference with local business or industry whose securities are not listed upon one of the national exchanges.

In fact, it seems to me that legitimate business not only has nothing to fear from it but that it ought to welcome it. As the editorial in Washington Star of last Monday well said:

> Opponents of regulation are attacking the measure on the ground that it will hamstring business. It certainly is designed to hamstring some kinds of business—the business of fleecing lambs particularly.

It may make it necessary for stock-exchange houses and dealers to reorganize their business somewhat, but other business ought not to be materially affected by it.

I know there has been a great deal of anxiety on the part of the managers of local industry over the legislation; but, with full appreciation of the fact that no one can be quite sure of the effect that legislation of this character will have until it has been actually put into practice, it is my judgment, and I give it for whatever it may be worth, that there is little reason for anxiety in this respect over the bill as it comes from the committee. It is hoped that indirectly the legislation will be a substantial help and stimulus to all industry and commerce by preventing an undue amount of the money and credit of the Nation from going into speculative channels, and thereby making it available for business and industry. My efforts at all times have been directed toward the framing of a constructive bill, which would correct existing evils and at the same time not interfere with legitimate business. I believe that the present bill fairly accomplishes that result. The ultimate justification for it, as of other legislation, of course, must depend upon whether or not it proves to be in the public interest and for the general public good.

The bill has gone through many changes since it was first introduced. It has been redrafted several times, and each draft has differed materially from the preceding one. The bill reported by the committee is altogether different in detail from the bill as originally introduced. After full and complete hearings before the full committee, it was gone over sentence by sentence by a subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and again by the full committee.

There has been so much dust kicked up over the prospect of the passage of some legislation on the subject that it has been hard at times to see the legislation itself on account of the dust. I think the dust has been cleared away some recently, and I hope that it will all be soon, so that everyone may take a good look at the bill without prejudice. It is our duty, of course, to forget who may be for or against it and consider it on its merits.

Whether the scare which business experienced was justified because of the actual provisions of the bill as first introduced, or was occasioned more because of the extreme and, in some respects, unwarranted representations and propaganda broadcast over the country by some of the representatives and leaders of business of what they conceived the effect of its passage would be, will always remain a mooted question. The extreme criticisms of the legislation, if they ever had any foundation in fact, must have been based upon the original draft of the bill. In my judgment, they have no application to the bill in its present form. In fact, I sometimes wonder if those who have protested so loudly against the passage of this legislation in the name of business are true representatives of business in their opposition to it, or if they are not misrepresenting business in doing so. Legitimate business ought to be as anxious as anyone to have the abuses corrected which this legislation seeks to correct. No one will benefit by it more.

The opposition to the legislation has reminded me at times of the story which our highly respected friend, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] tells about former President and Chief Justice Taft. It has been so different. Upon one of his visits to England, the English people were captivated with Mr. Taft and his personality. One characteristic which especially pleased them, as described by an English barrister, was his "mastery of understatement." Some of the critics of this legislation, and of those who are in sympathy with the purpose sought to be accomplished by it, will never be accused of the exercise of that characteristic in their opposition to it. On the contrary, they may be said to be masters in the use of hyperboles and overstatements. Congress, in the consideration of important legislation, cannot afford to have its judgment controlled by any fear of hobgoblins.

The bill may not be satisfactory to those who think that all corporate abuses can be remedied by legislation or who want to reform the world all at once, and it is not satisfactory to those who are opposed to any legislation to regulate the stock exchanges, but I believe that it will meet the approval of the great majority of people after they have had an opportunity to find out what is in it. To the extreme critics of the legislation one might suggest that they read the bill. If they will take the trouble to do that, I believe that they will find that the most of their criticisms are without foundation in fact.

It is not an uncommon thing to hear someone say that he is in favor of regulating the stock exchanges, but he does not want to hurt legitimate business; that he is in favor of legislation to regulate the stock exchanges, but that this bill goes too far. I do not agree with that position when used as an excuse to oppose this bill. I can understand the position of those who do not believe that the exchanges should be regulated by law at all, but I do not think that any legislation which would effectively regulate them could be passed and be much more reasonable and conservative than this bill is.

The bill has two primary purposes in view. First, to prevent excessive speculation in corporate securities traded in on the national stock exchanges. It is not to prevent speculation. There is no thought of that, although some people can see no good in it. Nor is there any attempt to draw any distinction between speculation and investment, or to tell when speculation ends and investment begins, or when investment ends and speculation begins. It aims only to prevent excessive speculation in corporate securities. Stated in another way, it proposes to attempt to prevent an undue amount of money and credit of the Nation at any time, and especially in boom times, such as the country experienced in the twenties, from going into speculative channels, and by doing that to keep it available for business and industry. The object of the bill in that respect, as in others, is not to hurt business but to help it.

It recognizes that business depressions can only be prevented or lessened by curbing business booms and seeks to make it possible to curb unreasonable booms in the future. Is anyone prepared to say that that is not in the interest of legitimate business?

The other day I received through the mail this folder, and I presume everyone else here received it. It is a synopsis of an address by Roger W. Babson, at the University of Florida on March 14, 1934. Let us see what he says on this particular question. I call attention to the fact that he puts alongside of the moral and physical welfare of the people a law which makes it necessary to curb booms in order to prevent depressions. I quote:

"We can make progress only by taking advantage of these three laws, namely, (1) by influencing the desires of the people for worthwhile things, (2) by recognizing that the fittest are those who develop spiritually and intellectually as well as physically and (3) by preventing business depressions through curbing business booms."

The second main objective of the bill is to provide the owners of corporate securities traded in on our national stock exchanges, and other investors, a fair and honest market or market place in which to buy or sell corporate securities. It is not to destroy the stock exchanges of the country. No sane man would do that. It is to help them maintain a fair and honest, free and open market, where the prices quoted on the exchanges will represent as nearly as may be the value of the securities there listed, uninfluenced by manipulative practices and evils which everyone condemns, including the representatives of the exchanges themselves. In other words, it aims to provide a market place where prices will reflect real values, not speculative ones.

Who is there to gainsay either one of these two objectives of the bill?

The truth of the matter is that the majority of the representatives of the exchanges themselves admit that some legislation should be passed to regulate them, to help their own governing bodies prevent recognized abuses, which they are unable to prevent or control without legislation.

Mr. Lothrop Withington, a Boston attorney, who impressed the committee as a man of candor and ability, appeared before the committee during the hearings, representing the Boston and New England Stock Exchanges and the Chicago Stock Exchange. He testified:

I have yet to find any exchange that has not only reached the conclusion that they are going to be regulated, but welcomes regulation, if it is a regulation which will make them better market places, and will eliminate practices which have brought down a national condemnation upon exchanges—abuses which should be corrected.

At another point in his testimony he said:

There are certain manipulative illegal practices which should be legislated against, and Congress will find the exchanges as glad as anybody to see teeth put into a bill with regard to those manipulative practices.

In testifying before the committee with reference to the second draft of the bill, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Black, in answer to a question of one of the members, said:

I do not think anything could have stopped the gambling mania of 1929 after it got under way. I think if the Federal Reserve Board had had these authorities in 1929 and had exercised them early enough it would have curbed those excesses to a very great extent.

In the consideration of the different provisions of the bill it is necessary to keep in mind that any effective legislation regulating stock exchanges necessarily involves the consideration of other factors and subjects, which at first glance may not appear to be directly connected with stock exchanges. As stated in the report of the committee—

Speculation, manipulation, faulty credit control, investors' ignorance, and disregard of trust relationships by those whom the law should regard as fiduciaries, are all a single seamless web.

They are all interwoven and interlocked—

No one of these evils can be isolated for cure of itself alone.

I sometimes think that as Members of Congress we are afraid at times to stand up and do the things which we instinctively know ought to be done for fear of being dubbed as belonging to some particular crowd. In this case we may be afraid of being accused of being associated with the stock exchanges or being led by some member of the "brain trust."

Let me assure the membership of the House that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is responsible for this legislation as it is now before you. The committee has taken advantage of the ability and services and information of Mr. Cohen and Mr. Corcoran and found them very helpful in the preparation of this legislation.

The committee also has welcomed the constructive suggestions of members of the stock exchanges and of business, and in some cases have found them helpful, but the judgment of the committee had to be convinced before any provision was put into the bill or taken out of it. The bill as reported is the work of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and of no one else.

I have before me the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the American Tobacco Co. case, handed down in January 1933. In order to hearten those who are afraid of the company they may be in, in supporting or opposing this legislation, I want to read a sentence from the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Stone in that case. I quote:

Extension of corporate activities, distribution of corporate personnel, stockholders, and directors through many States, and the diffusion of corporate ownership, separated from corporate management, make the integrity of the conduct of large business corporations increasingly a matter of national rather than local concern, to which the Federal courts should be quick to respond when their jurisdiction is rightly invoked.

I should like to paraphrase that last clause of Mr. Justice Stone to make it read as follows: "To which the Congress of the United States should be quick to respond when its jurisdiction is rightly invoked", as it is in the bill before us.

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. FORD. On page 20 of the report you touch on wash sales.

Mr. MAPES. I am coming to that. I think there is very little criticism of those provisions of the bill which outlaw the recognized abuses or evils of the stock exchanges themselves, such as wash sales, matched orders, bear and bull raids, and other evil practices understood to be directly connected with the stock exchanges themselves.

I am not going to comment at length on those, because they are not especially controversial. Wash sales, match orders, and bear and bull raids are definitely prohibited in the bill.

The Federal Trade Commission is given jurisdiction to prescribe rules and regulations to control and govern transactions relating to puts, calls, straddles, selling short, sales against the box, and some other things of that kind which the committee felt that it did not understand well enough to justify it in prohibiting altogether or limiting too rigidly, so they were left to the discretion of the Federal Trade Commission.

I am not going to discuss those features of the legislation, because I think they meet with very general approval.

I want to go now to the two sections of the bill relating to accounts and reports to be made by corporations, which have aroused the anxiety of many managers of corporations doing a local business and whose securities are not widely distributed. I should like to assure them as far as I can that this legislation is not designed to affect corporations of that nature. It is not designed to affect corporations that may have 20 or 40, or a limited number of stockholders who attend the annual meetings, are at liberty to examine the books at any time, and know what is going on. That kind of a corporation is not going to be affected by this legislation, but it is intended to affect, to regulate and control and prevent such practices as were indulged in by the American Tobacco Co., which was discussed in this dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Stone that I have alluded to.

In that case, through salaries and bonuses, the president of the company received a salary or remuneration of over $1,000,000 a year in 1930, and by certain stock allotment plans which were promulgated by the board of directors, his income was increased. In 1931 a plan was adopted by the board of directors for a new allotment of stock and the board solicited proxies of the stockholders for a meeting of the stockholders in which it was proposed to have them approve the plan. That stock allotment plan provided for the sale of stock to the employees. Mr. Justice Stone says there was a reference which carefully read might be said to intimate that it applied to officers, but in commenting on it he said:

It is a misuse of words of plain meaning to speak of such a proposal as a plan.

And he goes on to say:

We must interpret the proposal and the action taken by the stockholders in terms of their legitimate expectation that the directors were complying with their duty as fiduciaries and not dealing with them at arm's length. They were entitled to read the proposal in the light of the fundamental duty of directors to derive no profit from their own official action without the consent of the stockholders obtained after full and fair revelation of every circumstance which might reasonably influence them to withhold their consent.

They were entiled to assume that the proposal involved nothing which did not fairly appear on its face, and, above all, that it was not a cloak for a scheme by which the directors were to enrich themselves in great amounts at the expense of the corporation of whose interest they were the legal guardians.

We have heard a great deal about the American Tobacco case in the last few years. I wish I had the time to read you more of the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Stone in that case. The president of the company, under the stock-allotment plan which the stockholders approved without knowing what they were doing, took enough stock for himself to make him a profit of over $1,000,000 if he had sold it in the market on the same day he bought it from his company. In other words, he gave the company $25 per share for stock that was selling on the very day he got it for $112 per share and got enough shares to make him a profit on the transaction of over $1,000,000. His stockholders had no idea of what they were doing when they authorized proxies to vote to approve a plan which permitted such a thing. It is such things as that that this bill is designed to prevent.

We know, every member of the committee knows, that it is necessary to hold annual stockholders' meetings in order for a corporation to function. We also know that the average corporation is run honestly, and that the management does not intend to profit at the expense of its stockholders; but we realize that there is a limited number of corporations and corporate managers who have not that sense of responsibility of the fiduciary capacity they occupy to protect their stockholders and that some of them want to make money at the expense of the stockholders.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. In the case just cited, did the officer have an option of long time standing on that particular stock on which he made $1,000,000?

Mr. MAPES. He had no option at all. He devised a stock-allotment plan, which would enable him to subscribe for something over 13,000 shares, sent out requests for proxies for a stockholders' meeting to approve the plan, and in his letter to the stockholders as an inducement for them to sign the proxy blank stated that if the stockholders approved they would receive an additional dividend of $4 a share. Mr. Justice Stone says they had no information of what was going to be done, when they sent in their proxies. The action of the board of directors was confirmed, and on the day this president subscribed for these additional shares at $25 a share, he could have gone into the market and sold them for enough above what he gave for them to net him over $1,000,000. The shares were selling at $112 on the day that he contracted to buy them for $25.

Mr. BRITTEN. The reason I asked the question is this: Numberless cases have been presented to the public where officers have had options of long-time standing at very low prices.

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. And many million dollars have been made in that way.

Mr. MAPES. That was not so in this case. I want now to read what one of the witnesses before the committee said about the value of corporate reports. Mr. Fred Y. Presley, president of the National Investors Corporation, New York City, and before that for 6 years the organizer and manager of the Harvard Committee on Economic Research, said this, in regard to the value of informative corporation reports:

I very strongly believe that all corporations with shares outstanding in the hands of the public should be required by legislation to report quarterly, and promptly at the end of each quarter.

* * * * * * * *

In my opinion, if the public is kept fully informed currently regarding the earnings, financial status, and other considerations, by which we are able to determine values, that there would be much less inducement or basis for pool operations, for short selling, and for those other practices of organized exchanges which have been cheap, undignified, and pretty costly to the small investor.

Pool operations, in my opinion, are reared largely on very limited information about the stock which is being engineered and manipulated to higher levels.

The only way that pool operators can make a profit, ultimately, is to distribute such stock to uninformed people—certainly not to informed people. A great many of the most important pool operations have been conducted in the stocks of companies which have not been reporting quarterly and which have been giving the public just about as little information as necessary.

With complete publicity by corporations at frequent intervals, I do not think that stock prices would move to such high levels in a period of business prosperity, and for that reason I do not think there would be the same opportunity for short selling, since short selling can ordinarily only be profitable in stocks which have reached higher levels than the position of the company justifies.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to take the time of the Committee, but I do want to discuss some of the different provisions of this bill. As I said at the outset, I have no prepared speech to file.

Mr. SNELL. Would the gentleman care to yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. The proposition has been put up to me in regard to the obtaining of proxies that under the provisions of this bill it will be a very expensive proposition, and will cause a great deal of real trouble to legitimate business. I would like to have the gentleman explain what the conditions are that are different under the law which is being presented and the present law?

Mr. MAPES. The original bill contained some very definite and some very stringent requirements about the solicitation of proxies, which the committee felt ought not to be incorporated into the law. They would have made it very expensive to solicit proxies in a great many cases. The language now in the bill as reported by the committee simply authorizes the Federal Trade Commission to formulate rules and regulations for the solicitation of proxies which it thinks may be necessary in order to protect investors and the public. It clothes the Federal Trade Commission with very broad discretionary powers, in this respect, but does not bind the Commission to any specific form of control.

Mr. SNELL. Has the gentleman any idea as to what changes the Federal Trade Commission might require along that line which so disturbs business at the present time?

Mr. MAPES. I do not know that I can answer that. My own idea would be that the management of business, in a notice soliciting proxies, for instance, when it says, "We want all the acts of the board of directors for the last 12 months approved", should be required to point out what the matters of importance are that need to be approved. But that is all a matter for subsequent study and determination by the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. SNELL. Of course, there is nothing in the present bill that prohibits the Commission putting in effect the same provisions that were in the original bill and which the committee struck out, is there?

Mr. MAPES. Oh, if we assume the Commission is going to be unreasonable, I presume that is true.

Mr. SNELL. But, as I understand, the original bill came from that source. I am not talking about the bill which is presented here, but the original bill, I understood, came from someone who represented to a certain extent, perhaps, the Federal Trade Commission, or I do not know who.

Mr. MAPES. I am not sure that that is a fair conclusion. I think the bill as originally presented before the House committee was like a great many other pieces of legislation; probably hastily drafted and presented as a skeleton measure on which to start hearings. I doubt whether it was the final judgment of anybody or any particular group.

Mr. SNELL. But there is nothing that would prohibit putting into effect all the regulations that were in the original bill, if they wanted to?

Mr. RAYBURN. If my colleague will yield——

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think in their interpretation of it and in the court's interpretation of their power, they would certainly take into consideration the proposition that the committee considered those very sections and struck them out and wrote other sections in their stead.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me that is an improvement. The principal objection that has come to me from business in regard to this bill is the fact that it is leaving to the Federal Trade Commission the question I have just raised in regard to proxies; then the further question about additional reports that might be required when they are already making reports to the public-service commissions in the individual States, but, as I understand, that question has been practically eliminated as far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. MAPES. I intended to call attention to statements of the Moody Investment Service and of the Standard Statistics Service approving these accounting provisions or expressing the hope that they would not be weakened when they required more detailed reports than they do as reported by the committee; but I will pass over them, and I will go directly to the question which the gentleman from New York has raised.

The gentleman has spoken about the provision clothing the Federal Trade Commission with authority to administer the act. I think that on the basis of proposing something different or new, the suggestion that a separate commission should be created to administer the act has something to be said in its favor, but I can see no other merit in it, and I can see several reasons why this legislation ought to be administered by the Federal Trade Commission. The Federal Trade Commission has charge of the Securities Act. It has an organization now which is designed to see that fair business practices are maintained by business, and it would be mere duplication of service in many respects to put the administration of this law into the hands of another body. I do not know whether my view in this respect corresponds with the view of anybody else or not, but, personally, I do not think it will take a very big organization to administer this act as reported by the committee. I think it would be building up just another commission which would take on additional authority, perhaps, as time went on, but that it would be entirely unnecessary.

Furthermore, there is one provision in this bill which I think makes it very desirable to clothe the Federal Trade Commission with authority to administer it. The bill provides that that Commission shall be divided up into divisions. To one division will be assigned the duty of administering this act. Then the bill provides that anybody who feels aggrieved at any order of the Commission made under this act, or of any division of the Commission, can appeal to the full Commission. That appeal will be passed upon not by the two or three men who are principally concerned with the administration of this particular act but by the other members of the Commission as well. They may have a clearer, a more general, and saner view because of their other work. I think that is a consideration of no small importance in determining whether this bill shall be administered by the Federal Trade Commission or by a separate commission. I think it is fair to say, too, that those who first proposed this new commission idea were opposed to this legislation and wanted to weaken it in every way they could. For one I do not like that attitude. I am not in favor of taking any teeth out of this bill in that respect by the formation of a new commission.

There is one provision in this section, however, to which I am very much opposed, and that is the paragraph which takes out of the Civil Service the lawyers, examiners, and other special experts required to administer the act. I made a motion in the committee to strike out that paragraph. I think it is an unfortunate provision. In my judgment it labels this constructive piece of legislation in a way which it ought not to be labeled. I should like to see this provision stricken from the bill, and shall make a motion to that effect.

What was the other point the gentleman mentioned?

Mr. SNELL. The other matter was the question of making reports in addition to those required by the public-service commissions of the various States.

Mr. MAPES. I know the gentleman's point. The reason for including that provision was to enable the Commission in its discretion to call for more informative reports. It must be kept in mind at all times that the purpose of this legislation is the protection of the investors and the general public. In order to carry out this purpose, it was thought that the Commission ought to have the power, in those States where public utilities are not required to file intelligent, informative reports, to ask for additional information for the benefit of the public and the investor.

Mr. SNELL. Is it the gentleman's opinion that in States such as New York and others where the utilities do file comparatively full reports that such reports will probably answer all the requirements of the Commission under this bill?

Mr. MAPES. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman realize that it costs small corporations almost more money to get out the reports now required of them than it costs to conduct all their other operations?

Mr. MAPES. I hardly think so.

Mr. TABER. I can cite the gentleman to instances where the small corporations are doing just that very thing.

Mr. MAPES. What does the gentleman mean by small corporations?

Mr. TABER. I mean small utilities, such as little water and light companies in small towns.

Mr. MAPES. It is barely possible that some concern may be a little inconvenienced in complying with this law, may be required to report something that it is not now required to report. If, however, it is in the interests of investors and the public generally for it to do so, I think it ought to be willing to go to that additional inconvenience for the general public good. The very act of listing a security upon a national securities exchange invites the public to invest in the securities listed; and when the management of a corporation invites the public to invest in the company's securities it ought to give enough information to that public to enable it to invest intelligently and not oblige it to invest blindly.

I wanted to discuss the margin provisions of the bill but I am not going to have time.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. MAPES. For a very brief question; yes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. On page 7 of the committee report is reference to all loans from brokers and to securities and loans from banks. There is an impression on the part of some, which I think is erroneous, that all loans from banks on listed securities are limited to 55 percent of the value of the securities.

Mr. MAPES. This marginal provision has nothing at all to do with any transaction except loans to or by brokers, dealers, and members of the exchanges, unless the borrower wants to borrow on listed equity securities—which means stock—for the purpose of investing the proceeds in more listed securities. A person can go to the bank and borrow as much money with or without collateral as the bank will loan him to use in his business, to buy stock in a local company, or to do anything except to buy listed securities; and it has no application in any case as long the borrower can put up bonds or exempted securities, so-called. The provision applies only when the person goes to his banker and seeks to borrow money on an equity security, a stock listed upon a national stock exchange, for the purpose of buying other stock listed upon an exchange. Does that answer the gentleman's inquiry?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Very satisfactorily.

Mr. MAPES. There has been a lot of misapprehension about this marginal provision. As a matter of fact, while it suggests a standard of 55 percent to be advanced upon these equity securities, it allows the Federal Reserve Board in all cases to raise that standard if it thinks there is too much speculation going on, and to lower the standard if it thinks it is to the benefit of commerce and industry to do so. Furthermore, it can fix a marginal standard for banks different from that which is fixed for brokers; and it does not apply to loans by banks to an individual in any of the cases, such as I have pointed out.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. Does the bill give to the Federal Trade Commission power to require corporations to file uniform statements?

Mr. MAPES. The bill confers rather broad powers upon the Federal Trade Commission in that respect to enable the Commission to require corporations, if necessary, to make reports to their stockholders and the Commission that are intelligent and informative. Most corporations do that now, but there are a limited number of them that will not or do not tell their stockholders any more than they are obliged to do. That provision is aimed at the offending few. The managers of corporations are the servants and agents of the stockholders and certainly ought to report to their stockholders the condition of their companies.

Mr. THOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. THOM. Some of us are wondering how the provisions of the bill would control the situation where a borrower makes a loan from a bank but does not divulge the real purpose for which the loan is made.

Mr. MAPES. If the bank exercises reasonable discretion and is not able to find out, it cannot be affected. I imagine, however, there are few people who can get money from a bank without telling the banker what he is going to use it for. I do not think there will be very much trouble along the line the gentleman suggests.

I should like to refer to some other provisions in the bill but time does not permit. I want to close as I began by saying that I am in favor of legislation to regulate the stock exchanges and that I am, therefore, supporting this bill.

As far as I am concerned, I can see no consistency in being in favor of legislation to control stock exchanges and at the same time oppose the only legislation that will effectively do it. One cannot blow hot and cold at the same time, and if he is really in favor of regulating stock exchanges it seems to me that he must support this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN].

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Chairman, during the course of this debate we have heard some very able and illuminating arguments in favor of this bill from distinguished members of the Committee on both sides of the House. At this time I shall discuss only one phase of the subject, and that very briefly. I refer to the doubt and fear that exist in the minds of many honest business men and their employees as the result of the unfair campaign that has been waged by selfish interests to terrify them into opposition to this important measure.

It cannot be gainsaid that during the past 2 months a very powerful and bountifully financed lobby has directed a barrage of as vicious and insidious propaganda against this bill as has been witnessed within the memory of the oldest Members of the House. The object of such false propaganda has been to create fear in the hearts and distrust in the minds of business men throughout the land. All Members of the House have received numerous protests, and we of the committee have been deluged with telegrams and letters in opposition to this legislation.

I wish every citizen in the United States could have heard, or could read, the exposure of those methods in the magnificent speech delivered day before yesterday in opening this debate by the able, hard-working chairman of this committee, who, with lion-hearted courage, has stood like a stone wall against as subtle influences and as powerful pressure as were ever resorted to in an attempt to influence any committee chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Most of the telegrams, obviously inspired by the New York Stock Exchange lobby, have come from people who are misinformed as to the provisions of the bill and have been deceived into believing that its enactment would be destructive to all corporations, whether their securities are listed or unlisted. That is wholly untrue. It would neither destroy nor injure any honest corporation anywhere. The principal attack has been directed at sections 11 and 12, those providing for listing requirements and reports for the protection of investors. Notwithstanding the general, false impression that has been created by the lobby, the only corporations that would be required to make the reports so strenuously opposed to are those whose securities are listed on a national stock exchange or are sold through over-the-counter brokers and dealers who set up a public market for both the purchase and sale of the securities in question.

This measure is intended to protect, not to destroy; to safeguard investors in listed securities instead of permitting a repetition of the tragic crash of 1929. We believe it will go far toward the restoration of confidence in both the exchanges and the securities listed on them.

When the original bill was presented, merely as a basis for hearings and preliminary consideration, there was rather wide-spread apprehension that its enactment would be injurious to industry, commerce, and the general financial structure of the country. No member of the committee wanted that. After weeks of exhaustive hearings, the present bill was evolved by an able subcommittee and the full committee. In formulating this bill there was eliminated, in my opinion, every provision that might have constituted a reasonable and just ground for fear on the part of any honest business interest, whether it be a stock exchange, corporation, bank, or broker.

In the consideration of this bill we see history repeating itself. When the Interstate Commerce Act was pending, the railroads saw in it the hobgoblin of destruction. Scarcely a railroad official could be found now who would wish to have the Commission abolished. When the Federal Reserve Act was before this body, some of you were members of the House and I think will bear witness that many great banking institutions believed the Federal Reserve Act would wreck and ruin them. Today scarcely an intelligent banker could be found who would advocate its repeal.

It is believed that the enactment of this bill into law will foster a higher degree of public confidence in the stock exchange and help preserve it as a necessary and legitimate market place for the sale of securities; will afford a larger measure of protection to honest corporate business; will make more secure the holdings of the average citizen and insure greater confidence and safety to the investor in securities.

The white light of publicity is the surest protection to the public against manipulation of the market, the unfair practices of designing men, and all the tricks of financial legerdemain which scheming minds can devise.

Why should investors not have the information required by this bill? We are not dealing with the small-town corporation, the managers and owners of which are neighbors, personal friends, and daily associates. We who have seen the informative report of Dr. Splawn to our committee, on the relation of holding companies to operating companies in power and gas affecting control, must be impressed with the necessity for the disclosure of such facts as this bill would require. In one case it is shown that the holding company is 11 companies removed from the operating company. We find one man who is a director in 240 utility companies. With such relations existing between the ownership and the management of modern corporate business, has not the investor the right to expect us to give him adequate legal protection?

In order for a corporation to list its securities on the New York Stock Exchange the rules of the exchange require it to furnish all the information provided for in this bill except that concerning salaries and bonuses.

When we witness the spectacle of the president of the American Tobacco Co. receiving, in addition to a princely salary, a bonus of over a million dollars in 1 year, I am convinced that the investors in the stock of that company are entitled to have the benefit of that information. I go further than that. I believe that it is sound public policy that when tobacco growers, engaged in the hardest work known to farm life, spend an entire year in the production, harvesting, curing, and marketing of tobacco, for which they receive less than the cost of production, they also have a right to know that the head of a company that purchases and manufactures the product of their soil and their toil receives such a fabulous bonus in 1 year.

Wall Street and its minions are here full panoplied for battle. This committee speaks for the unorganized millions who have no lobby and whose voice is inarticulate. They have not sent us an avalanche of telegrams, but they expect and have the right to expect that we will do our duty. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL].

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, from September 1929 to June 1932 the market value of bonds listed on the New York Stock Exchange alone depreciated $9,387,000,000. In this same period of time and on that one exchange, brokers' loans were liquidated to the extent of $8,308,000,000. In the same period of time and on that one exchange only, of the twenty-and-odd exchanges in the country, the market value of listed stocks shrank $74,034,000,000. This is a total destruction of values and liquidation in 34 months of $91,729,000,000 on one exchange. What goes up must come down. What does not go up so high does not have to come down so hard.

This loss and liquidation to the investors of America averaged $2,800,000,000 a month for 34 consecutive months. This liquidation and destruction of values to the American investors averaged $100,000,000 a day for 3 long years. The American investors took a loss on account of that debacle of $100,000,000 a day for 1,000 days on the listed stocks and bonds of one exchange, or more in 1 day than the difference between the President and the Congress recently on World War veterans' relief for an entire year. The loss was three times the national debt, and it started in the New York Stock Exchange because we did not have means to put a brake upon that south sea bubble that has gone down into infamous history as the Coolidge bull market.

These figures indicate the size of the problem, but not all that we are trying to accomplish in this legislation because this loss of $92,000,000,000 was on the listed stocks and bonds of one exchange alone. It was exclusive of the stocks and bonds listed on other exchanges and all stocks and bonds that are unlisted everywhere in America. It is exclusive of the destruction of the value of commodities in this country, such as warehouse receipts on cotton, wheat, copper, and so forth, and on merchants' inventories.

It is exclusive of the destruction of the value of real estate in this country, and it is exclusive of the thousands of banks and building and loan associations with their millions of innocent depositors who went down to hopeless ruin because of that debacle which started in New York due to the fact that we did not have brakes to prevent speculation from going to the point where the bubble burst.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman in his statement includes legitimate stocks as well as racketeer stocks, I presume?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes; all stocks.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman does not mean to say that the reason for this rise and subsequent fall, which he terms as a destruction of security values, was by reason of the fact that we did not have sufficient regulatory laws so far as legitimate securities were concerned?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes; I do. I say that we did not have sufficient brakes to prevent inflation even in legitimate securities.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman tell me what provision there is in the pending bill that would prevent the rise to probably unwarranted heights and the consequent fall in the value of legitimate stocks, such as the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., or any of those stocks? What provision is there in this bill that would stop just what happened in 1929 in regard to legitimate stocks?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I will be glad to answer the question. The answer is the power given to the Federal Reserve Board to raise margins as the bubble is being blown up, thus putting on the brakes, and to soften the margins as the market comes down, and thus tend to straighten out the tremendous peaks and valleys of the inflation curve in speculation.

Mr. MOTT. That is the particular provision which the gentleman thinks will stop that?

Mr. PETTENGILL. It should, if it is administered by a brave and courageous board. We have given them the power.

Mr. MOTT. I just wanted to get the gentleman's idea.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman is making an interesting statement in reference to lodging additional powers in the Federal Reserve Board. The gentleman knows that the Federal Reserve Board failed in a mistaken policy in regard to this situation in 1928 and 1929?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I know that is true.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is there some provision in the bill which will insure to the American people safety so far as the activities of the Federal Reserve Board are concerned?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I am sorry to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania I cannot positively assure him about that. We have got to trust somebody to administer the tools we put in their hands, and the Federal Reserve Board has said that with this bill and with the Glass-Steagall Act of last June, they could have stopped or minimized this debacle.

Mr. McFADDEN. That is a question of policy of the Board.

Mr. PETTENGILL. It is a question of the use of the tools that are placed in their hands. Someone must always administer the laws of legislative bodies.

Mr. McFADDEN. If you have a board with a mistaken policy——

Mr. PETTENGILL. Or a cowardly board, of course, a tool does not do any good. I grant the gentleman that.

Mr. McFADDEN. And, of course, the gentleman realizes that during this particular period the Federal Reserve furnished over $200,000,000,000 with which to keep that stock market in a foment.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I do not have the figures in mind.

Mr. McFADDEN. Has the gentleman given consideration to the question of stopping the flow of Federal Reserve funds into this market?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes, we have; but that is not in the bill. It is in the Glass-Steagall bill of last June. I do not want to take the time to discuss that. If the gentleman wishes to discuss it in his own time, I hope he will do so.

Mr. McFADDEN. It is an important part of this question.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I am not wedded to every clause or paragraph or section of this bill. Amendments that I favored in the committee were lost and amendments that I opposed were adopted, but I am here to defend this bill as a whole. I think the time has come when this gigantic speculation must be declared to be a matter "invested with a public interest." Knowing that this has caused a collapse of values in this country like a row of dominoes or like a fire that starts in a gambling resort and sweeps over and wipes out an entire city, it is time to declare it as invested with a public interest, because we lost as a result of this debacle three times the cost of the World War. I hope in what I may say this afternoon I may reassure the legitimate, honest investors and business men of the Nation that this bill as a whole will help and not harm.

President Wilson once said, "I must cut deep, but I must cut carefully. I must cut out the things that are decayed and rotten, but I must leave every wholesome tissue absolutely untouched."

This was certainly the spirit of our committee in the consideration of this bill. There was not anything vindictive or vengeful about it. I never saw such painstaking and sincere effort to get the viewpoint of everybody who had anything to say that would be helpful. We tried to consider the legitimate interests of the 1,500 members of the New York Stock Exchange and the members of other stock exchanges of the Nation on the one side, and we certainly tried to consider the legitimate interests of the 10,000,000 individuals in America who own the securities of America, with a present face value of at least $100,000,000,000.

We know that the exchanges perform a useful, and they have in times past performed harmful service to the American people. They have been acting in a dual capacity both as a Monte Carlo of gambling and as a legitimate market place for the purchase and sale of securities. The New York Stock Exchange is a sort of financial Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. We want to kill the "jackal" and save the "hide."

Now, my friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] said the other day that "the real object of this bill is the Russianization of business and credit in this country." Mr. Chairman, I do not want to Russianize America. I want to save America from another debacle that might Russianize America.

Now, what are the true facts about this matter? I hope that the calm perspective of a quarter of a century may bring this matter into clearer perspective than the heated political atmosphere of the present time. I want to read from a report that was made in 1909 on listing requirements:

The exchange should adopt methods to compel the filing of frequent statements of the financial condition of the companies whose securities are listed, including balance sheets, income and expense accounts, and so forth, and should notify the public that these are open to examination under proper rules and regulations. The exchange should also require that there be filed with future applications for listing a statement of what the capital stock of the company has been issued for, showing how much has been issued for cash, how much for property, with a description of the property, and also showing what commissions and secret profits, if any, have been paid to the promoters or vendors. Furthermore, means should be adopted for holding those making these statements responsible for the truth thereof.

This bill comes within the framework, if not within almost the specific details, of a recommendation which was written long before the gentleman from Kansas, my able but misguided friend [Mr. MCGUGIN], ever heard of Dr. Wirt, or my friend from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] ever heard of the "scarlet-fever boys."

Who wrote these words that I have been reading to you? Whose recommendation is this within whose framework, if not within whose very language the present bill is bounded and defined? It was written by a committee appointed by the Honorable Charles E. Hughes, Republican Governor of the State of New York 25 years ago.

I hope that my mention of Governor Hughes in this connection will not cause any of these timid souls who look under the bed before they go to sleep every night—I hope it will not bring the name of that great Chief Justice of the United States, rendering distinguished public service to the Nation at the present time, under suspicion that he is a secret agent of Moscow; but if that should be the case, it would not be the first time he has suffered from names of this sort, because during the insurance investigation which he conducted so ably in 1905, he was called names that the New York Times did not find "fit to print." At that time he was charged with "destroying business" and the most powerful figures in his party tried to lure him from the trail of rottenness he had discovered by offering him high political office, which he refused until the job was done.

And yet as a result of his investigation and the legislation which followed the confidence it was said he would destroy was so firmly established in the great life-insurance companies of the Nation that they went through the hurricane of the past 4 years almost unscathed. Hughes was the friend of legitimate business at the very time he was charged as being its enemy.

Let us stop calling names and analyze this bill. I wish everyone would take the trouble to read the entire report of the Hughes committee of 1909. The very things that are contained in this bill were urged then, margins, pyramiding, pools, wash sales, matched orders, corners, subsidizing the press, men lending their names to corporate boards without knowing "the accuracy and good faith of the statements" of corporate affairs, and so forth.

It took this last final cataclysm to do what should have been done long ago.

I call your particular attention, as one of the most important matters now under consideration, to that part of the Hughes report dealing with the "effect of the money market on speculation."

The paragraph is as follows:

It has been urged that your committee consider the influence of the money market upon security speculation.

As a result of conditions to which the defects of our monetary and banking systems chiefly contribute, there is frequently a congestion of funds in New York City when the supply is in excess of business needs and the accumulated surplus from the entire country generally is thereby set free for use in the speculative market. Thus, there almost annually occurs an inordinately low rate for "call loans", at times less than 1 percent. During the prevalence of this abnormally low rate speculation is unduly incited and speculative loans are very largely expanded.

On the other hand, occasional extraordinary industrial activity, coupled with the annually recurring demands for money during the crop-moving season, causes money stringency and the calling of loans made to the stock market; an abnormally high interest rate results, attended by violent reaction in speculation and abrupt fall in prices. The pressure to retain funds in the speculative field at these excessively high interest rates tends to a curtailment of reasonable accommodations to commercial and manufacturing interests, frequently causing embarrassment and at times menacing a crisis.

The economic questions involved in these conditions are the subject of present consideration by the Federal authorities and the National Monetary Commission. They could not be adjusted or adequately controlled either through exchange regulations or State legislation.

In other words, gentlemen of the Committee, the Hughes committee in 1909, 25 years ago, recognized the need for some sort of a "planned economy" in the monetary field, to prevent the excessive flow of credit into the New York money market from being destructive to legitimate business throughout the country. They recognized a quarter of a century ago that this required Federal legislation, that it was beyond the power of a single State, beyond the power of the board of governors of a single exchange to control.

So this fatuous charge that this bill originated in Moscow or Georgetown utterly fails. It originated in the Hughes report in 1909, under a Republican Governor; the Pujo report in 1913, under a Democratic House; the investigation by a recent Senate committee started under a Republican administration and culminating in the Democratic platform of 1932.

These are the American sources, Republican and Democratic, for this bill. It is not the product of either the "brain trust" or a "brain storm."

The New York Stock Exchange, as has been stated, already require practically all the information required in this bill. But we are legislating for all the exchanges of the country—not one alone.

It has been developed in the progress of debate that the Moody Investment Service is for this bill; it has developed that Babson is for the bill; it has been developed that the Standard Statistics Service is for the bill. I will not repeat their statements. I refer to Mr. RAYBURN'S speech of Monday, page 7913 of the RECORD. These services all make mistakes in forecasting the future, but certainly it cannot be contended that they are unfriendly to the investors of the Nation or that they want to "Russianize America." I wish everyone who has been disturbed about this bill could read their statements. They are high-grade houses depending upon the good will of their subscribers, and their statements ought to go far to reassure anxious investors and corporate officers.

Let me quote from one additional service, which has not thus far been mentioned. I refer to the report of March 3, 1934, published in San Francisco by the Silberling Research Corporation. It is as follows:

Those only should speculate who can afford to lose; and furthermore the losses of speculation should not be permitted to wreck the fortunes of millions of innocent bank depositors as well.

These points of criticism will be seen to be of relatively minor character. In the main we approve with enthusiasm and conviction the purpose of this legislation and regard most of the current abuse heaped upon it as poorly aimed, misleading, and in the end not likely to produce a severely adverse effect either on the market or upon general public sentiment.

We as a Nation do not have to repeat our mistakes forever for the benefit of promoters and exploiters. We see no reason why any concern, large or small, cannot fulfill the requirements for listing under this act if it is competently and honestly managed. The New York Stock Exchange has had many years in which to force its listed companies to tell the public a reasonably full story about their earnings and other essential things and it has notably failed in this attempt, as anyone wishing to secure such information about most of the eight-hundred-and-odd listed companies can easily determine. We see in more adequate publicity the doom of vicious pool practices which live on secrecy, the end of managements which are more interested in trading the stock market than producing useful goods and service.

And then it concludes:

If people want to operate their affairs in the dark, they have no claim upon the interest of the average investor.

As for the ability to borrow on collateral, is it not now abundantly clear that the difficulties in our banking system were due in an important measure to the very ease with which bank portfolios could be loaded up with advances on trashy securities?

We are convinced that with some unessential modification this legislation will conduce to the protection of the investor because it will provide insurance against pernicious secrecy and malpractice in corporate doings and will prevent unreasonably engineered market operations which defeat rational analysis and shatter confidence. We can see reasons for expecting, as a result of this great reform, a wider international demand for our good securities and a freer flow of capital than ever before into enterprises which have certified their willingness to play fair with the public.

Please note that last—

A freer flow of capital than ever before into enterprises which have certified their willingness to play fair with the public.

This gives us ground to hope that this legislation will in the end be the best thing for the markets themselves and honest business, and their thousands of employees, just as the Hughes investigation of the life-insurance companies proved to be an inestimable blessing to the companies themselves.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes.

Mr. DUNN. Can the gentleman tell me why it is that the gigantic corporations, such as the utilities and the steel corporations, are opposed to this bill?

Mr. PETTENGILL. There were many reasons, some of them good, such as the fear that trade secrets, formulas, and so forth, might be made public. But amendments have taken care of such objections, I believe. As for the rest, it is my guess that they have been carrying many items on their books or in their heads, such as campaign contributions to influence legislation and utility-commission decisions, which they do not want their investors or the public to see.

Mr. DUNN. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes. I repeat what I said a few days ago, that I believe the measure now before us for consideration is the most important piece of legislation that has come before this Congress. Especially is this true from the standpoint of the public interest.

REGULATION OF STOCK EXCHANGES

I am very much in favor of the provisions of the bill relating to the regulation of stock exchanges. People who invest their money in securities are entitled to some protection; and if those who are charged with holding these securities do not protect them, then they have a right to come to this legislative body and ask for protection.

Legislation for the regulation of stock exchanges should have been passed long ago. We all know the unfair practices and the crooked manipulations and excessive speculations that have gone on on some stock exchanges of our country in the past, and especially in the last few years. During the deliberations of the committee who had charge of this legislation I favored all the provisions of the measure which related to the regulation of stock exchanges, and I hope that this Congress will pass some legislation to that effect.

GOVERNMENT REGULATION OF INDUSTRY AND BUSINESS

However, as most of the members of the committee know, I was more interested in that part of the bill which went far beyond the regulation of the stock exchanges than I was in the regulation of the stock exchanges themselves. I cannot agree with my good friend the chairman of this committee, nor with my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], when they stand on the floor of the House and try to leave the impression that the opposition to this measure which has been expressed by business and industry was all inspired by the New York Stock Exchange.

I have more confidence in that great organization of business men in the industrial district in which I live than to believe that the New York Stock Exchange has inspired their opposition to this measure. Again, I think they have a perfect right to oppose this measure. It has been intimated here in a way that they are all wrong when they come to Congress and protest against some of the provisions of this legislation. If they cannot protest to Congress, which is considering the measure, to whom will they go? I do not question the right of the industries and business men in my district and those scattered throughout the great State of Ohio to protest to a Member of Congress and tell him there are some provisions of the bill which they believe will be detrimental to their interests. I, like many other Members, have received numerous telegrams and letters from business houses and industrial corporations protesting against the passage of this bill. In not one of these protests that I have received is there any objection to the regulation of the stock exchanges. As a matter of fact, 99 percent of the protests that I have received from business men and corporations say they favor the regulation of the stock exchanges. I call attention now to a few of the hundreds of protests that I have received. This telegram I have in my hand comes from the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., the B. F. Goodrich Co., and the Firestone Rubber Co., of Akron, Ohio, the greatest rubber industrial center in the world. These three organizations employ upward of 50,000 men and women in their plant. Can anyone standing here on the floor say that any one of these organizations has ever tried to take advantage of its stockholders?

Can you say that they have brought forward certain practices in order to beat their stockholders out of the earnings of their securities? I believe these men are honest. They are charged with the investment of the people's money. As I said a few days ago, the big, heavy industries in our country today, like the rubber and the steel companies, have sweat blood during the last 3 years. In my own district, which is the second largest steel-producing section of the United States, during the years 1930 to 1933, every one of the companies lost millions of dollars in the operation of their plants, but they kept them open because they had invested money in those institutions, and they wanted to give as many workingmen employment in order that they might provide some sort of livelihood for their families. Do you classify them as crooked manipulators who are trying to rob American people who have invested their money in their securities.

I have here another telegram from several large corporations in Cleveland, protesting against that part of this bill which has no direct relation whatsoever to the regulation of the stock exchanges. They believe certain provisions of the bill will very materially affect their business and make it harder for them to bring about economic recovery.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I yield just for a short question.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is that same type of manufacturing enterprise that I am concerned about in my own district. They raise some very serious objections to the provisions of the bill which do not deal with the stock exchange. Have those provisions been modified in this bill as compared to the original bill?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes. I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I yield, briefly.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that Mr. Henry I. Harriman, speaking in the city of Washington a few hours ago to the Twenty-second Annual Meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, said to the gentlemen there assembled that business in America could not accept the stock exchange bill as first reported?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Now, I will tell you what heavy industry needs today. I have talked to the men who have charge of those industries—those men who, as I said a moment ago, sweat blood during the last few years in trying to keep their plants in operation. What they need today is relaxation of credit. They have told me that if there could only be a little relaxation of credit and they could get the money, it would not be long before we should be well on the road to recovery, as far as heavy industry is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. My colleague from Ohio has been so kind to me that I will yield for a short question; not for a speech, however.

Mr. TRUAX. I agree with the last statement made by the gentleman, but is it not true that that is what everybody, including the farmer and the small business man, needs today, namely, relaxation of credit? [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I agree with the gentleman; yes, sir. Now, of course, we all want to see recovery from the terrible economic depression we have passed through. I have been informed that the one thing business and industry are afraid of, with regard to the passage of this bill, is that it will make it a great deal harder to get credit in the future. Of course, if they cannot get credit in a lawful way they should not have it.

I received a letter from the general counsel of the largest steel industry in my district, in which he said if it were not for the Securities Act of 1933, there would have been $10,000,000 invested in this district during the last year.

I want to be fair and say that there has been some modification of this bill. When we first received the bill, it was much more objectionable than it is now. I am glad the committee saw fit to make some of the modifications. I personally should like to have the bill framed along the line of the commission report which the President selected. Early last year the President selected a committee known as the "Roper Committee." Secretary Roper, of the Department of Commerce, was at the head of that committee. He wanted them to proceed along the line of writing legislation for the regulation of the stock exchanges. They did. That is a public report, and you can get it. During the hearings on this bill, which we are considering, the Assistant Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Dickinson, appeared before our committee.

I say to you that in all my experience in Congress I have never heard a more brilliant man or a more sound man, a clearer thinker or speaker than Mr. Dickinson. He made some very strong objections to the legislation which we then had before us. We asked him why the President's report was not accepted and written into legislation. I forget what his answer was, but the truth of the matter is that the President's committee report was set to one side. Mr. Landis, of the Federal Trade Commission, Mr. Tom Corcoran and Mr. Ben Cohen wrote the legislation which was presented to our committee in the first instance. There is no question about that, because Mr. Landis made that statement before our committee himself. I say the bill has been modified to a great extent, and it is not as objectionable as it was when it was first presented to our committee. Therefore I do not want it understood here today that I am directly opposing the passage of this legislation. As I stated a moment ago, I believe we ought to have legislation for the regulation of the stock exchanges, and we should have had it long ago, but I want to call attention to the fact that sections 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 17, 19, 23, 28, and 32 of this bill have no direct relation to the regulation of stock exchanges. Section 13 deals with proxies.

PROXIES

Strong objections have been made by business and industries from all parts of the country against this section. They maintain it has no place in stock-exchange regulation.

If it is desirable that the solicitation of proxies should be governed by rules and regulations of the Federal Trade Commission for listed securities, a similar rule or regulation will be adopted by the Commission with regard to unlisted securities under the authority of section 14, and section 14 gives to the Federal Trade Commission the power to set up rules and regulations in regard to unlisted securities that are not on one of our national stock exchanges.

Again, section 13 means that any person soliciting a proxy—I want the House to pay attenion to this, and I am only bringing it up so that you may know what is in the bill—section 13 provides that any person soliciting a proxy, listed or unlisted on the exchange, is subject to the rules and regulations of the Federal Trade Commission, and that to solicit a proxy in violation of any rule or regulation the Commission may prescribe is made a criminal offense, punishable by fine and imprisonment. The Federal Trade Commission, under this bill, has the power to set up any rule or regulation that it desires regarding the solicitation of proxies.

The solicitation of a proxy in violation of any rule or regulation the Commission may prescribe is made, not a misdemeanor but a criminal offense, punishable by fine and imprisonment. This section gives to the Federal Trade Commission the power by rule and regulation to create criminal offenses in connection with the matter of soliciting proxies, and shows the extent to which the bill goes in an endeavor to control the conduct of individuals in the moral and everyday business activities of life.

OVER-THE-COUNTER MARKETS

Section 14 deals with over-the-counter markets. I wonder if we realize the extent of the grant of power given to the Federal Trade Commission in this section. Over-the-counter markets are defined in this section, which relates to the buying and selling of securities of any corporation which securities are not listed on any national stock exchange. This section gives the Commission the broad power to make rules and regulations governing entirely intrastate transactions—not interstate, but intrastate transactions. The violation of such rules and regulations is declared to be unlawful and is made punishable by fine and imprisonment. Such business today is not only governed by provisions of law but there already exists in almost every State "blue sky" laws for the protection of investors, laws designed to eliminate abuses. The Federal Securities Act of 1933 also covers transactions of this sort. Section 14, should it become law, will make every corporation whose securities are bought and sold, even though locally, subject to the rules and regulations of the Federal Trade Commission.

CONTRACTS

Section 28 (b) makes void every contract made in violation of any provision of the act, or any rule or regulation thereunder, and every contract the performance of which involves the continuance of any relationship or practice prohibited by the act.

The far-reaching consequence of this subsection is little comprehended. This provision, coupled with the use throughout the act of the words "it shall be unlawful", opens the door to a vast amount of litigation which may involve many of the daily commercial and banking transactions of our country. If, perchance, through the error of a clerk, or even of a partner, a miscalculation has been made as to the amount that could be legally loaned or borrowed, it could not be corrected, for if a transaction be void, neither party can seek redress in a court of law. The infinite number of questions which arise from an examination of this section makes it clear that it should be carefully considered by the House.

SECTION 32. CRIMINAL PENALTIES

I now come to the penalty section, and with this I close. This section makes no distinction between acts which are intended to be criminal, such as the manipulative practices set out in section 8, and the violation of ever-changing rules and regulations of the Commission. I believe the criminal penalties should be confined to the specific things which are intended to be made criminal.

I wonder if we want to write into this bill, however, a provision which provides a fine and imprisonment for the violation of a rule or regulation having no direct connection with the regulation of the stock exchange. Should we go so far as to subject any person, business man, banker, official of industry, or employee to the hazard of criminal prosecution for the possible violation of a rule or regulation of the Commission? This provision gave very much concern to the committee having the bill in charge and under consideration. It will be said that the criminal provisions are confined to a willful violation of the rules and regulations of the Commission. Ah, my friends, the proof of whether the violation was willful or not will have to be made in court. We should remember, however, that it is the indictment of the individual which is likely to destroy his standing and reputation in the community in which he lives, not whether he may be found guilty; and he could be indicted for violating a rule or regulation. The proof of his innocence by showing that the violation was accidental and not willful is not news. Papers would not have much to say about that; it would not be given the same publicity as his indictment was. The mere indictment of a prominent citizen is a sad thing to him no matter in what community he may live.

Mr. Chairman, in a brief time I have tried to set forth my views on some parts of this legislation. As I said, I believe we ought to have regulation of the stock exchange, but I trust we can modify the bill to some extent, at least so that business and industry which are fighting for their life today would feel more confident that they are going to be able to carry forward in a legitimate and lawful way. If they are permitted to work out their own business without too much governmental regulation, they will succeed and at the same time be of great benefit to the country at large. [Applause.]

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. I wish to ask the gentleman a rather pertinent question. During the course of his remarks the gentleman named several men with whose names I am not acquainted. If I remember correctly, the gentleman stated they were the people who drafted this legislation.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. They drafted the first bill; yes.

Mr. MOTT. I want to ask the gentleman as a member of the committee if he knows whether any of these people who drafted any of this legislation have ever had any personal and practical experience in the regulation of the sale of securities; whether any of them has ever held office as securities commissioner or has otherwise been connected with the regulation of securities?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I believe one of the three gentlemen who was responsible for the drafting of this bill did make the statement before our committee that at one time he worked for some broker on the New York Stock Exchange.

Mr. MOTT. That is not the regulation of securities. I think I know at least by reputation, if not personally, almost every securities commissioner of the country, although their names may be unfamiliar to me. I used to be securities commissioner in my own State.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. The gentleman in discussing the last section of the bill having to do with penal provisions said that one might be held accountable where one was guilty of willful misconduct. Does willful misconduct apply to the individual alone, or does the bill seek to hold a man responsible for the misconduct of his agent? The first bill was so construed. Is a similar construction applied to the pending bill?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The penalty applies to the person or persons who made the report or violated a rule or regulation of the Commission. There is no question that this bill delegates to the Federal Trade Commission the power to legislate and fix penalties which provide for fine and prison sentence.

Mr. Chairman, I surrender the floor. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, as the Members of the House know, I am not a member of the committee having this bill in charge. I have not had the opportunity of becoming as familiar with its provisions as have those gentlemen who are members of the committee. I have followed the course of this legislation as best I could, in view of responsibilities which rested upon me as a member of other committees, and I have listened very carefully since the debate upon this bill began.

I confess that the effect of this legislation is so far-reaching and the provisions of the bill itself are so technical that I have been put to great concern as to just what my attitude of mind should be toward it. This one statement contained in the report which I read again last night is enough to impress the average Member of this House, namely, that practically one half the national wealth is represented by stock of corporations and by corporate and Government bonds. All this property represented by such securities is unquestionably directly affected by this legislation.

As I consider one piece of legislation after another, I am impressed in recent days with the general trend in the nature of it all. The general trend of legislation of late embodies an attempt to make men honest under compulsion of law. We have had in recent years some experience with a law which was designed to make men and women live in accordance with a standard of thought sought to be set up under prohibitive restrictions. We saw that we could not effect our purpose by such a law.

I voted for the National Recovery Act. I knew that in theory the act was sound. I knew that the industrial fabric of the Nation had been pretty nearly wrecked by men who with splendid opportunities had gone so far in an attempt to satisfy their selfish aims that they lost sight of their obligations to the general public. Here is an act which says we must put American business in a strait-jacket. Under compulsion of law we must set up a standard of business ethics and hold the iron hand of Government over it. I do not know whether such a policy will succeed or not.

This so-called "securities exchange control bill" recognizes existing abuses, which no doubt ought to be corrected. The theory of it is that we should put these exchanges in a strait-jacket. We should hold over them the iron hand of compulsion by Government, and we should drive them to a course of honesty.

As I read my history, I am impressed with the thought that it is almost impossible for one generation to pass the lessons of its experience to the next. We seem in each era to have to learn our lessons for ourselves. I have about concluded that, while it is no doubt your duty and my duty to set up in the laws which we pass the highest standard of conduct, we are doomed to be very much disappointed in the final results. You cannot make men honest by law. You cannot clean up business under legal compulsion. The wits of man will thwart every attempt you make, and the remedy will never come until there is in this country a different attitude on the part of men who by reason of their splendid ability have come into positions of power and opportunity to make wealth for themselves, but who fail to use their opportunities to build for the future in a way which will serve the social and governmental structure of the Nation. When the day comes that enough men in places of power, profiting by the lessons of history, will see that nothing is to be gained by thinking only of oneself and in setting up vast corporate structures to be used for profit to those who designed and conceived them but not to pass on any benefits to the many, then a long-suffering people will begin to come into that fuller and richer life which is deservedly the aim of every government and every parliamentary body to attain.

I wonder how many of us really sense in these days the tremendous responsibility that is ours. I know I have sometimes lost the right point of view. All of us become more or less discouraged at times. The average man here tries to see the right; he tries to lay aside party lines; he wants to do something that will help the Nation, but he goes on from year to year with no personal gain to himself except that he may have learned to stand up and take a mud bath upon all occasions and with good grace. He sometimes thinks that his place in this Government of his is not of much importance after all; but, Mr. Chairman, each one of us holds a certain measure of responsibility here which is going to mold the future business and social life of this Nation. I see many things in this bill which I do not like, but I cannot bring myself to believe that I shall have done my full duty here unless I give it my vote. [Applause.]

Unfortunately I cannot be here in the House if the final vote on this bill is to come before the first of the week. I have committed myself in weeks gone by to be elsewhere. I have arranged a pair, but I want the opportunity to vote upon some amendments. There has been, as has been stated, a great deal of misunderstanding about this legislation and the effect it will have.

In no event could I have voted for the bill as it was originally introduced. Very many important amendments to the original bill have been made, the aim of which was and is to guard against abuses and at the same time do no injury to legitimate business. But the bill, even in its improved state, can be further improved.

I do not think this Congress can justify the legislative provisions contained in lines 18 to 23 on page 34, which confer broad and unknown discretionary powers upon the Federal Trade Commission. The bill, after laying down the strictest requirements which must be complied with by those who would list their securities on the exchange—and these requirements quite properly aim to make public legitimate information concerning the financial structure, the nature of the business involved, together with various facts which directly affect the value of the securities listed—imposes upon the vast business interests concerned the obligation of complying with such additional requirements as to such reports as are deemed necessary for the protection of investors in the pure discretion of the Federal Trade Commission.

And, mark you, any corporation which might knowingly or otherwise violate any changed rules or regulations adopted under the changing personnel of the Federal Trade Commission is subject to criminal prosecution.

It seems to me, if there are evils to be reached, definite provision for reaching them should be made. Any attempt to forecast the future by blanket authority conferred upon any bureau to make rules and regulations having the force of criminal law is utterly unwarranted, in my judgment. Such a policy of lawmaking cannot encourage business confidence, and without business confidence we cannot make any recovery progress.

On page 35 similar discretionary power is given to the Federal Trade Commission to determine the use of and the authorization of the use of proxies. Again I repeat, if there are definite evils in the use of proxies which are to be reached, the bill should set forth definite remedial rules in order that business interests may know just what they are to comply with.

This year the Federal Trade Commission might decide that one practice is correct, but next year their point of view might change, and changed regulations vitally affecting all interests concerned would seriously disturb business stabilization. It would seem to me that while many of the provisions of this bill are wise, and while unquestionably the purpose of the committee reporting it is a laudable one, the committee should be content to report a bill which states definitely the evils to be dealt with and lays down specific regulations and rules in accordance therewith. If they are uncertain at this time as to what the evils are, the light of subsequent experience should guide us in our legislative course. The reposing of broad discretionary powers, such as those to which I have referred, is unwise and unjustifiable.

Quite clearly, it is thus proposed to deal with possible evils arising in the future by advance authority in the Federal Trade Commission to assure new rules and regulations. Such a course is not consistent with wise legislation and is, I submit, most unfair to business.

I repeat that I shall gladly vote for amendments to correct the faulty provisions of the bill to which I have called attention.

Let us not attempt to take too many steps at this time. I hope the Congress will be content to deal unqualifiedly with the present known situation without attempting in a veiled way to remedy all possible abuses which may by chance arise in the listing and sale of securities by any blanket grant of discretionary powers in the Federal Trade Commission.

Because the bill has been vastly improved by the committee having it in charge, and because I believe that as a whole its salutary provisions far outweigh its deficiencies, I shall vote for it. I shall hope for further improvements in the bill during its course in the House, and I have the confidence to believe that when the bill is finally reported by the conferees of the Senate and the House a real forward step in the correction of existing abuses will have been made in the listing and sale of securities. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN].

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. Mr. Chairman, at the outset of my remarks I should like to correct a mistaken impression that may have been left with the Members of the House at the conclusion of the very able address of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]. I would like to answer that, however, when Mr. COOPER is in the Chamber; and as I see he is not present at the moment, I shall continue my remarks until he returns.

As our chairman, as well as other members of the committee, have so well said, this bill has been the subject of the most vicious campaign of malicious propaganda ever waged against a single piece of legislation coming before the Congress. Realizing the faith which the people of the United States have in the President of the United States and his new deal, selfishly inspired opponents of this legislation have even sought to discredit the President and have flooded the channels of public education with the cry, "The new deal is leading to communism." Well, I say that if the new deal is leading to communism, then all America needs is a little more communism. [Applause.]

The thought that occurs to me in connection with the stock-exchange control bill is the fact that while these people are howling the allegation that this bill provides for the regimentation of industry they forget the thousands of people who lost their life savings and who were fleeced of their life's earnings in the stock-market crash of 1929, who demand Federal regulation of this sort to prevent a recurrence of a tragedy of that kind, and the hundreds who went the suicide route bear silent testimony to the urgent need of this legislation.

The fictitious wealth created in the stock market is in constant danger of collapse, yet those who loudly clamor against the remonetization of silver as being inflationary illogically lament that this bill might be deflationary. It is not; rather, it is designed to prevent the creation of fictitious values. It is designed to prevent giving a man a scrap of paper in exchange for his life's fortune and then permitting that man to find the grave his only consolation at the end of his days, as occurred in 1929, while those who cause the tragedy are permitted to escape unscathed and unharmed.

As long as the captains of industry and the giants of finance, so called, realized the helplessness of their plight, they permitted Franklin D. Roosevelt and the new dealers to lead without vicious attack, but now that America is arriving they want to misrepresent his whole program, to cast discredit and distrust upon him and his advisers, and to discredit this very worth-while legislation and even reduce him in the public eye to the ignominious role of playing the part of a puppet. They forget the condition of our country the day Franklin D. Roosevelt took the oath of office, when the banks of our country were literally crashed, when finance was frozen, when business was tottering and trembling, and when millions of hungry, weary workers tramped the streets, seeking not a job—a job could not be had—but sustenance for themselves and their families.

It is safe to say that no President, not even Lincoln, took the oath of office under more trying or under more difficult circumstances. [Applause.] It took the genius of Lincoln and the bloodshed of the Civil War to accomplish the abolition of negro slavery and save the Nation, but without bloodshed, be it to his eternal credit, the present President of the United States has largely abolished the economic slavery that existed up to the time of his assumption of the duties of his office, thereby becoming the second savior of our Republic. [Applause.]

I say to you that this very worth-while bill for the regulation of the stock market is necessary in the interest of the laboring people of America. Realizing the fact that under the guidance of the great and distinguished leader of America today we have at least temporarily suspended that abominable, cancerous growth upon the body politic, economic and social—child labor—and replaced the vicious "yellow dog" contract with the proud American laborer's right to collective bargaining with his employer, let us not stop in our steady march of advancement for the protection of the common people of America.

This bill provides a necessary step. This bill provides not for the regimentation of industry, but, as I have before said, it provides for the protection of the people of America rather than the privileged few. [Applause.]

The Nation has been recently alarmed by the threat of communism and revolution contained in the now famous Dr. Wirt letter. It is high time the people of this Nation know the reason for the introduction of this letter, after which the matter contained in it dwindles into insignificance.

Before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, urging that section 12 be eliminated, Mr. Rand declared that it appeared that this broad power to call for any information that the regulatory commission thought was necessary would make it possible for the regulatory authority to harass American business by calling for unreasonable reports.

That was the answer given in response to my question as to why section 12 should be eliminated from the bill. What possible bearing can the reading of the Dr. Wirt letter have on the elimination of section 12, which merely provides for giving information relative to the regulation of the stock exchange to a public commission? I brand that letter now, as I did before our committee, as treasonous and irrelevant and as a red herring dragged across the trail of this worthwhile bill for the regulation of the stock exchange; to reflect discredit on the authors of the bill and the so-called "brain trust" and the President of the United States; and to discourage the Members of Congress from necessary regulation and control of the stock market and of industry on the ground that such legislation smacks of communism.

Yes; there is a plot to overthrow the old-established order. There is a move—it received its start March 4, 1933, when Franklin D. Roosevelt took the oath of office—a move to change the Government from Wall Street, where it formerly was, to where it is at the present moment, and will remain as long as Franklin D. Roosevelt is President of the United States [applause]; not to the little green house on K Street nor to the little red house in Georgetown, but to the White House on Pennsylvania Avenue. [Applause.]

Were it not for the quiet and peaceful revolution that occurred November 8, 1932, then I dread to think of the calamitous revolution which might have ensued, ending in what Dr. Wirt calls "communism." A psychology of despair and of revolution cast its gloom over the entire Nation; a spirit of discouragement and depression which, had it continued, might have resulted in the overthrow of the Government itself in bloody and riotous revolution. Were it not for the drastic measures thus far enacted by the new deal and the "new dealers", then the ravings of Dr. Wirt might have been history of the past instead of a vain prophecy of the future.

No; the progressive policies of the new deal are not dangerous. Rather, real danger lies lurking in the insidious propaganda designed to undermine the whole new deal.

A noted writer once said, "If you wish to discredit a worthwhile program, say it is 'socialistic'." If championing the farmer rather than only the bankers, if protecting the forgotten man, rather than only the railroads and insurance companies, if protecting the security of innocent investors in the stock market, if spending large sums of money on worthy public projects to relieve distressed citizens—if all these things constitute communism, then the new deal is communistic and we are proud of it. [Applause.]

Is it un-American to have set up an organization throughout the country to save American homes and farms? Is it un-American to have set in motion machinery for reemployment of millions who were yesterday on the bread lines? Is it destructive of confidence and destructive of American ideals to promote the proud American laborer's right to collective bargaining with the employer? Would America change the new deal of today for the drifting into chaos and ruin of yesterday? The answer of real red-blooded Americans is an emphatic chorus of "noes." The social control of the new deal, as evidenced by a bill such as the stock-exchange control bill, prevented a catastrophe of national scope against which the rugged individualism of previous days could not avail.

Those who desire to discredit this bill further say that we are going into the private life of every individual. They shout dictatorship in connection with Mr. Roosevelt. That to me seems almost sacrilegious. No race need fear persecution from that great lover of all mankind, Franklin D. Roosevelt. No religion need fear persecution from him. The press is not muzzled, and no one, great or small, need fear exile for criticizing him or his policies, as is evidenced by the deluge of propaganda which was set in motion against this very worth-while bill. Time enough to shout distatorship and communism when any of those things occur, but the protection of the weak and the lowly and the promotion of the general welfare as is designed by the stock-exchange bill is not communism, it is Americanism, sound Americanism, and I base that upon the authority of echoes from the past. [Applause.]

"Labor in this country is independent and proud; it has not to ask the patronage of capital." Did that statement make a Communist of Daniel Webster? Was Lincoln a Communist when he said, "Labor is superior to capital, and deserves much higher consideration"? If this bill be revolutionary, let us consider what Jefferson said. He said, "A little rebellion now and then is a good thing. It is a medicine necessary for the sound health of government." Thank God, we have a man in the White House today who is able to lead the way to these changes quietly while the Nation follows the steady march of advancing improvement with wondering amazement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. A dictator? No. A leader? Yes. We have a real leader in the White House. The progressive policies advocated by the "new dealers" do not constitute communism. They constitute the American spirit of liberty and independence, without which alone we need fear America's safety and security.

At this point I want to answer objection that has been raised to this bill by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] and to correct a mistaken impression that I know he did not intend to convey, that this bill covers listed and unlisted securities. If he will look on page 35, section 13, line 12, he will find the words "registered on any national-securities exchange."

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. And I wish to make a further observation. He stated that this covered intrastate commerce. It does not cover intrastate commerce; and if you will refer to page 36, section 14, you will find that it covers anyone who makes use of the mail or any instrumentality of interstate commerce.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. After I have finished I shall yield.

It further provides only that only those who violate any rule or regulation made by the commission under the provisions of this act shall be liable to a criminal charge.

We find that the new deal has not been foolproof, and this bill cannot be foolproof. No one short of that lowly Nazarene who came to show us the way, the truth, and the life, and upon whose teachings President Roosevelt has rested so firmly in his desire to establish proper principles of the new deal--no one, I say, short of Him can claim entire freedom from mistake in human activity, but, based on the principles of that greatest leader and teacher of all times as an exemplar, President Roosevelt is trying to follow Him, in suggesting certain provisions of this bill, when He drove the money changers from the temple. Based on those principles, I say, the new deal and this bill are bound to succeed, and the American people will survive, following the leadership of the man who occupies the White House. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. He has asked for a stock market bill with teeth in it. The people of America, the humble business man, the broker who is honest, desires to follow the leadership, not of the wolves and bears of Wall Street, but rather the benevolent leadership of President Roosevelt, who is trying, against overwhelming odds, to bring order out of disorder and put America back on its feet. I hope, therefore, that the Members of Congress will follow the leadership of the President of the United States who desires only the protection, security, and safety of the people of America. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does the gentleman deny that there is a provision in this bill which gives to the Federal Trade Commission the power to set up rules and regulations for the sale of unlisted securities in the over-the-counter market?

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. I do not deny that.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. That is what I talked about.

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. But I believe the gentleman unintentionally made an overstatement when he said that any regulation which the Commission laid down would be the subject of penitentiary or criminal offense.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield once further?

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I like the gentleman from Montana very much. He and I are members of the same committee, but I regret he is the first member of the committee who has injected partisan politics into this debate today. [Applause.]

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Recognizing that this is probably the last piece of major legislation which will reach the House this session, is the gentleman prepared to state that we have gone far enough in the new deal to solve the economic problems?

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. No. I do not believe we have gone far enough yet. We need and we must have a universal 30-hour week. We need and we must have the remonetization of silver, an adequate national old-age pension, and unemployment insurance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] has expired.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the able, distinguished, and good-looking gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the kind remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL], and I wish now to pay compliment to the able address of the distinguished Representative from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN]. The gentleman, I observed, stated that this bill was not free from possible mistake or criticism. I would like to point out to the House very briefly one or two things which have impressed themselves upon me. In the first place, we are all agreed that there should be regulation of some kind. The stock exchanges themselves state that they do not object to regulation.

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KENNEY. Certainly.

Mr. MONAGHAN of Montana. I want to say that I admire the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY], and I want to say that I believe the gentleman is as honest and conscientious and able as any Member of the House or any member of the committee; but does not the gentleman realize that every time there has been an effort to control industry in any respect, the cry has always gone out, "If you regulate us, you will ruin us"?

Mr. KENNEY. That may be true. But I believe industry should have a free hand as far as possible.

When we come, as we do now, to regulating stock exchanges, we approach it, I believe, from two angles. First of all, there is the moral side. It has been said that our people have gambled to excess upon the market exchanges of the world.

We were told that the machinery was dangerous; that men were losing toes and fingers; that there were no guards on the machines, to the inevitable injury of the public. So we undertake by this bill to install safeguards to protect the public from the dangers of the stock-market machinery as it formerly existed. To the credit of the stock exchanges of the country it must be said that they have discounted in large measure what we are going to do by making regulations of their own, discontinuing wash sales, pools, matched sales, and other manipulative practices which reacted to the detriment of the investors of our country.

There is the other side that we are dealing with, and that is the side which constitutes the credit problem of the country. Now, over in the Senate there is its stock-market regulation bill which places under the control of the Federal Reserve Board the regulation of stock-market credit by extending its authority to deal with margin requirements to be imposed by the member banks of the Nation. Here we go a step further. We not only extend the hand of the Federal Reserve Board over member banks for the purpose of controlling such credit, but we provide that no credit shall be extended to any broker or dealer except from or through (1) a member bank of the Federal Reserve System, (2) from a nonmember bank which shall have filed with the Federal Reserve Board an agreement to comply with the provisions of this act, the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, and the Banking Act of 1933, which are applicable to member banks and which relate to the use of credit to finance transactions in securities, or (3) in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe. Stock-market credits, therefore, must under this bill be obtained through the banks and loans from other sources are prohibited except as allowed by the Federal Reserve Board.

So you will not have another situation like you had in the late panic and immediately preceding, when call money from large institutions outside of our banking system came into the money market and furnished an inordinate degree of credit which resulted in excessive speculation. Stock-market credit can be had under this bill only through the banks, and the Federal Reserve Board will have complete control of all market loans.

We have gone far enough by the provisions to which I have referred in our purpose to control stock-market loans and prevent excessive speculation. Consequently I feel that we should not insist upon the high, and, in my opinion, unreasonable margin requirement in this bill. We undertake to set up a margin standard, and we do that by saying that the margin shall be 45 percent in one place, and in the next breath we say that it shall be 100 percent of the lowest price at which the security has sold in the last 36 months, but not in excess of 75 percent of the market price. I maintain that that is no standard, the margin fluctuating as it does from 45 percent down to 25 percent. If we are to have a standard, then I think that standard should be fixed. I would like to see in this bill a requirement that the margin should be only 33⅓ percent. I, for one, do not want to dry up the market for securities the ready sale of which has built up our great enterprises. The country today is virtually on a cash basis. We must relax and extend credit, and reasonable credit, to business and industry and to the purchasers of their securities. You will remember back in the beginning of the automobile days when our people paid cash for cars. Comparatively few cars were sold, and then only to a privileged few.

The minute credit was extended to purchasers of automobiles manufacturers increased their business and cars were sold by the millions. Relaxation of credit brought this about. The automobile instead of being a luxury for the few has grown to be everybody's necessity. Our security markets have always been liquid; to keep them so—and we should—a sane and reasonable standard should be established.

It may be said that the margin requirement is satisfactory to the stock exchanges and their members. That makes no difference. The securities of the country should be kept liquid, and I intend to offer an amendment at page 14, line 5, striking out the figures "55" and inserting in lieu thereof the figures "60", thus reducing the margin requirement from 45 percent to 40 percent. If Congress is to set a standard, let us set a standard that will be lived up to. We pass too many laws that are not lived up to or obeyed. I should like to see a standard below which we would never go, when it comes to the margin requirement. I predict right now that if this margin requirement is left in the bill it will only be a short time by necessity, if you are going to maintain a liquid market, when the Federal Reserve Board will lower the margin, and then the standard set by Congress will be exploited. I want to see acts of Congress obeyed by the people of our country.

In my opinion, this bill is of sufficient importance to warrant the setting up of an entirely new commission to administer it. The Federal Trade Commission, I believe, is a misnomer. This bill deals with practically half the wealth of the country, not only the business, but the finance of the country. It might well be that the Federal Trade Commission would be the body to administer this bill were the banks of the country controlled by the commercial interests of the country as used to be the case; but bankers now control the banks. I should like to see this control divested and put back in the hands of the commercial and business interests of the country where I believe it belongs.

But until that time comes, dealing with finances as well as with business as we are under this bill, the administration of the act is so important as to warrant the setting up of an entirely new commission to take charge. The Federal Reserve Board will have to increase its machinery; the Federal Trade Commission, if given jurisdiction over this law, will have to increase its membership. It is better by far to establish an entirely new commission to administer this act and also take over the administration of the Securities Act.

I should like to refer to the manner in which business is affected by this bill, but time does not permit. I am hopeful, however, as I know the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. RAYBURN] is hopeful, that, whatever commission administers this act, it will immediately dispel all fears of undue interference with the orderly conduct of the business of the country.

It is true the bill contains severe criminal provisions, but these provisions are not intended to affect the individual who in good faith may violate some technical or abstract rule promulgated under the authority of the bill; and I hope those administering the act will never seek to impose any criminal penalty for a technical infringement, and unless there has been a gross violation of the act through misrepresentation or fraud or willful injury to the investor and the public interest. I should like to see a law passed here that would react in favor of the business of the country, one which would restore confidence on the part of our people in the securities of our commercial and other enterprises which have been reared upon the ready market for their stocks and bonds. This bill as presently written seems to go somewhat beyond that—and further, I believe, than it was intended to go. I would regulate the securities market by a bill which would awaken the stock exchanges to the realization that they had regained the confidence of the investing public, which would assure reasonable and wise administration of the act, which would be hailed by our people everywhere as salutary legislation for the betterment of the Nation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER].

Mr. CROSSER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, it is generally agreed by students of the subject, including many outstanding brokers and others actively connected with the stock exchange, that there should be proper regulation. Let me assure my colleagues that in providing for regulation I desire to see the exchange and those connected with it treated in an absolutely fair way. I believe that our committee made an effort to remove all reasonable objections from the bill in order to be fair, while at the same time providing for proper regulation. Apparently, however, the objections now offered are as sweeping and denunciatory as were the objections to the original bill. The opposition, therefore, seems to be hostile to any kind of regulation, and the propaganda against the amended bill is as great as it was against the original measure.

Let me add a word, therefore, to what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] said about the propaganda of the stock exchange.

I call attention to the fact that the propaganda did not begin last February when the bill was introduced. It has continued for years. The exchange maintains a publicity department and an economists' department which employ from 24 to 30 people, who are constantly engaged in disseminating their views throughout the United States.

In the last 5 years the New York Stock Exchange has spent nearly $1,000,000 for publicity for the purpose of influencing the minds of the American people in regard to its business. This is not all. You remember the utility interests' efforts to penetrate the schools, the colleges, and the press of the Nation? The stock exchange, on a lesser scale, has done the same thing. Lecturers go about the country addressing students in colleges telling about the value and usefulness of the exchange. They have had prepared and issued a textbook. It is called "The Work of the Stock Exchange." It is alleged to describe how stock buying and security markets function. In fact, however, it is an attempt to impress upon the minds of students the exchange's views as to the value of its service to society. This book was published by a well-known publishing firm in New York. Almost all the copies were bought by the stock exchange. They bought 7,650 copies. It was placed in the hands of economic teachers, writers, publicists, and public officials all over the country. They put 1,724 copies in the public libraries of the country. They placed 1,146 copies in college libraries. They placed copies in the hands of the economic faculties of 514 colleges. Students in colleges are being referred to this book.

I do not dispute the right of these gentlemen to present all the arguments at their command. I do say, however, that as human beings they are likely to see things from their own viewpoint, and in the way that they have been in the habit of seeing them for years.

Certainly it seems fair and proper to say that what they believe to be self interest would induce them to promote their own views in regard to the subject before us with the most effective publicity available to them.

While I concede their right to use these means of publicity it is certainly entirely proper to call attention to the fact that systematic and methodical means of publicity have been employed to carry to the people of the United States the views entertained by these gentlemen in order to have the people accept their views. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE].

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I do not at this time care to discuss this bill in particular, but I do wish to call attention to the reasons why this propaganda, as it has been termed and which has been so much denounced, has gone over the country, or has come from the country to Washington.

This is the third bill on which our committee worked. The first bill was H.R. 7852. So vicious was it that the Assistant Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Dickinson, by his remarks upon it, drove an army truck through it. It was this bill, H.R. 7852, that went out to the country that caused the fear in the minds of business over this country; that is the bill that caused the trouble. In justice to the chairman of the committee it should be said that he did not draft it. It was, as one man said, "drafted by myself and some other groups." I had trouble getting out who the groups were. All this appears in the hearings. As I say, that is the bill that caused the trouble. After we got through with it we had another bill, H.R. 8720, I think it was; and we worked upon it. That bill was not quite so bad as the first one, but it still caused trouble, still caused fear. It also went to the country; it also caused fear. But the committee after further hearings and further amendments perfected the bill, and be it said to the credit of the committee and the subcommittee having charge of the redrafting of the bill, they did a pretty good job with the present bill, but it was only reported out last week; the country did not know anything at all about it.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Certainly.

Mr. EVANS. Then, if I understand the gentleman, the bill now before the committee is really the bill of the committee and not of the group which drew the first two vicious bills.

Mr. BULWINKLE. No, sir; they had very little to do with this one.

Mr. EVANS. Did they have anything to do with it?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I think they were attorneys for the committee or something. Two of these gentlemen were attorneys for the coommittee, but it was practically the work of the committee.

Mr. EVANS. But the gentleman does feel that this bill represents the reactions and the work of the committee?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes; of the subcommittee composed of the chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. It is a fact that when an objection was made to a section or to a paragraph of a section and the committee saw fit to correct the draft of the bill to meet the objection, Mr. Cohen or Mr. Cochran brought it in in some other way at some other point in the draft.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I do not think so. I want to be just to them as I want to be just to the members of the stock exchange, for not a member of the stock exchange and not a single man appearing before the committee said he did not believe in regulation. They said they believed in regulation.

The only thing that was different with all of us was the degree of regulation. Some wanted little teeth and some wanted tusks. So far as I was concerned personally, I just wanted some moderate-sized teeth.

I will be frank with you. There are 39 provisions in this bill which create an unlawful offense right off the bat. Thirty-nine times it is declared to be unlawful to do something. There are 18 times, 17 for the Federal Trade and 1 for the Federal Reserve Board, 18 in all, that these two commissions may promulgate rules and regulations, a violation of which is a criminal offense. So out of it all we have a bill of some 60 pages which may create a criminal code reaching to a large number of sections.

May I say that the committee did a great piece of work. On the other hand, the propaganda that was sent out to defeat this bill was not aimed at this particular bill, but at the first bill. You who have lived in industrial districts in the last few years, you who have seen starvation, you who have seen the unemployment, realize that if anything is done to one of those industrial plants it will put this condition back into effect. Business, like a scale, is just quivering in the balance. May I say that we ought to be careful to deal justly and righteously with all.

May I say something else about this propaganda question which has been talked about here? In the past 4, 5, or more years, not only in this administration but in some others, the more we have become a State legislature for the United States of America the more propaganda we will receive. You cannot help but do just that, because the more you enter into the affairs of the people at their homes the more letters you are going to get from home. You cannot avoid that situation. There is nothing wrong in it, though may I say for myself that I have only had five telegrams and letters from my district about this bill.

Mr. WOLFENDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WOLFENDEN. Does the gentleman know the amount of foreign securities that are listed on the New York Stock Exchange?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I think in all it is about $8,000,000,000.

Mr. WOLFENDEN. What will become of these securities if the issuers fail to seek registration by July 1, 1935?

Mr. BULWINKLE. If the issuers fail to seek registration, the investors, who are Americans largely, will suffer the loss.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman stated that the committee has done a good piece of work. Prior to that the gentleman stated, as I understood him, that the committee had delegated to a Federal body the power to create a criminal code. Does the gentleman think that is good work?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I said they did a pretty good piece of work, as compared with the first bill. I want the gentleman to understand that if I were drawing this bill it would not be this kind of a bill, but we have to have some sort of a bill.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman does not believe it is sound to delegate to a governmental body the right to legislate as to what is or what is not a crime?

Mr. BULWINKLE. We are going to have to delegate some authority, but I would have done it to a less degree.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The gentleman believes this bill should be amended. Will he state what amendment should be adopted, in his opinion?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I believe a separate commission should be created. I am firmly convinced that the Federal Trade Commission, even though it should have two new members added, and consist of seven members in all, have enough work to do as it is without adding more burdens. I believe that a separate commission of three men, though some have suggested five, should look after the entire securities and exchange situation of the country. These many thousands of corporations would have to list their securities with the commission and report to them. It should be a separate commission. I believe it would be better administered, and I believe there would be less fear in the eyes of business men if this were done, not because they have any great amount of fear of the membership of the Federal Trade Commission. I know the Federal Trade Commission has already started working against this amendment, but why give them more power? They have enough to do now. They should not ask for more power.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. The gentleman has referred to numerous instances in which this commission is given power to prescribe what shall or what shall not be treated as a crime.

Mr. BULWINKLE. They are given the power to promulgate rules and regulations.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Will the gentleman state whether or not my understanding is correct; that is, in many of these instances is there anything in the nature of an appeal to a court?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Oh, yes; there is.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Is there the right of appeal from conviction for violation of a rule or regulation to the court?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I do not know of any instances in which there is not the right of an appeal as far as the criminal offenses are concerned. Of course, all criminal offenses are tried in court.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Is there any appeal from the decision of the Commission?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes. You may go to the Federal court in civil matters.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. An appeal may be taken from an order of the Commission?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Is there an appeal from a rule or regulation as promulgated by the Commission?

Mr. BULWINKLE. May I say that the rules and regulations prescribe criminal offenses, the violation of which will be tried in a United States court. The Federal Trade Commission or any other commission does not try criminal matters. The United States courts try those matters.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I do not know whether the gentleman completed an enumeration of the amendments which he should like to see adopted.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I have another amendment to suggest, and this will immediately brand me as coming from Wall Street. I have never had anything to do with stock, except some cotton-mill stock, which I lost completely, so I hold no brief for Wall Street. I would revamp the whole section in reference to the reports which corporations would be compelled to make and would take some of the fear that business has out of the situation, though in my revamping it would not be much different from what it is at the present time.

Mr. CULKIN. The press recently carried the statement that Mr. Doherty, of the Cities Service, had sold a billion dollars of stock and had expended some $900,000,000 keeping up the market price of the stock while he was selling the stock to the American people.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Ask me something about this bill, please.

Mr. CULKIN. That was merely preliminary, I may say to the gentleman. What section of this bill will cure that procedure?

Mr. BULWINKLE. One of the experts over here will have to answer that question. Mr. Chairman, which section will cure that procedure? I cannot answer that question.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. Would the gentleman be in favor of an amendment to protect the investing public by having the stock listed upon the securities board contain the book value or the accountancy value of every stock that is listed so that an investor would then know actually what the stock is worth and would not have to buy a cat in the bag.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will not the investor, after he goes to the Federal Trade Commission at the present time be able to find out what are the securities that are listed there, and then go to the Commission or to the stock exchange and find out all about it?

Mr. SIROVICH. But if you have the stock listed with its book value you do not have to go through all this red tape.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The investor will just have to go to the stock exchange or the Commission and find out about it.

Mr. SIROVICH. They cannot tell him about that at the stock exchange.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Under this bill they can, because the report is made to the stock exchange by each corporation.

Mr. SIROVICH. But it is not mandatory.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It certainly is mandatory. That is one thing I am fussing about right now.

Mr. BRITTEN and Mr. CLAIBORNE rose.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield first to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. If I am correctly informed, the gentleman will offer an amendment providing for a commission of three members.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BRITTEN. Two of them to be Democrats and one to be a Republican.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Well, I never distinguished between Democrats and Republicans at all. That would not do.

Mr. BRITTEN. Sometimes it is impossible to do so.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I said not more than two of one political party and one of another. The gentleman ought to keep the political parties out of these matters. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. There are a number of men on the floor of the House who want to go along with him on such an amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BAKEWELL].

Mr. BAKEWELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this measure. I do so with some reluctance, because I am not an expert in this field, but I feel that I should be remiss in my duty to my constituents if I did not voice a protest against this bill.

I have read and reread this measure; I have read with great care the committee report; and I confess frankly there are some provisions of this bill that I do not yet thoroughly understand. And this is one difficulty with the measure, one of the causes of the apprehension which has spread over the country: Its provisions are unclear, so much so that members of the committee who have been sitting for weeks working over this bill line by line are not agreed as to precisely what it means. One thing is certain, if this measure is enacted, following upon many others with perplexing obscurities, there is one profession at least which will not suffer from unemployment, and that is the profession of the lawyer.

We are told that this bill was put into the hands of the President on the eve of his departure on his fishing vacation, and that he forthwith put the seal of his approval upon it. I marvel greatly at his ability to read and digest at a glance this complicated 60-page bill. And yet the subject is so vast; so complicated and intricate are its many provisions, that somehow a feeling of incredulity steals over me. I do not believe that he intended to put the seal of his approval upon this bill in all of its details. He approved of its general purpose and of certain general provisions to meet that purpose. He has told us definitely what he wanted.

I recommend to the Congress—

The President said—

the enactment of legislation providing for the regulation by the Federal Government of the operations of exchanges dealing in securities and commodities for the protection of investors, for the safeguarding of values, and, so far as it may be possible, for the elimination of unnecessary, unwise, and destructive speculation.

With regard to this general purpose there is no disagreement whatever amongst us. We are all in favor of that. Members of the stock exchange, representatives of industry also favor regulation of securities exchanges. And we all favor action which will prevent riotous and uncontrolled speculation, which will chop off the peaks of the boom years in order to fill up the valleys of depression. Every one is in favor of regulation which will, so far as it is possible by law to do so, prevent those inequitable and unfair practices which have developed.

I have had many letters of protest, very few of them from those interested in the stock exchanges, and most of them from prominent industrialists of my State, men of great ability, of highest integrity, public-spirited citizens who are fearful of the results that will follow the adoption of this measure.

I should like to read from some of these letters, but my time is so limited that I can only give you a sample of the sort of thing that has come to me.

The first one is from Mr. Brower Hewitt, of the Acme Wire Co., New Haven, Conn.:

Certainly no one could have any objection to a bill containing reasonable provisions for the regulation of stock transactions, but this bill goes far beyond any such reasonable regulation, providing as it does for a very rigid and, I believe, unwise control over all industrial productive endeavor. It does not seem to me that, simply because certain individuals have perpetrated unfair stock deals of various sorts, that legitimate manufacturing businesses, small and large, should be penalized and handicapped as they may be under the operations of the proposed bill.

More specifically, I would object to provisions of sections 6, 11, 12, and 14, which throw particularly onerous burdens on small businesses whose stock may not be listed on national exchanges. While it may not be inherent in the National Industrial Recovery Act that small businesses are discriminated against, I think it cannot be denied that in certain instances the codes have produced that result. Here again in the Fletcher-Rayburn bill small businesses will be further handicapped as against their larger competitors. This seems to me such an unfair thing and so highly undesirable that I cannot believe there is any desire on the part of the administration or the Congress to bring it about.

The second is from Mr. N. W. Pickering, of the Farrell-Birmingham Co., of Ansonia, Conn.:

I am protesting against it entirely as regards its effect on industry. Under the guise of exchange regulation it places business under commission control, requiring innumerable reports which may be made public, and will perpetuate bureaucratic control of business.

This I believe to be another step in the insidious policy of the so-called "brain trust", or radical element, which is working for but one end, and that is the nationalizing of industry and many other activities of the country, which can but result in destroying the initiative and the independence of action which over a long period of time has proved the salvation and success of this country.

It is no longer a question of party politics. Thinking people are beginning to realize that there are only two parties in this country:

(1) The party which desires to maintain the institutions, customs, and the integrity of a government which has climbed to heights above all others.

(2) The party which wishes to sacrifice all of our benefits and comforts, obtained through hard work, on the altar of experiment and ultimate communistic union with the Soviet Government.

We have heard a great deal of criticism of wide-spread propaganda in connection with this bill. But surely, when a measure is pending in Congress that affects the interests of large groups of citizens, it is not surprising, nor is it reprehensible, that they should protest against it. If this were a bill regulating the farming industry, would you not expect the farmers to protest if they thought it opposed to their interests, and would not the farmers' unions send out letters stimulating lethargic farmers to active opposition? We have had propaganda sent out under this administration on a larger scale than we ever have before, even during the war. I myself have received a document giving instructions to speakers, with prepared speeches for delivery on every sort of occasion, supporting the N.R.A. and other parts of the recovery program. That was propaganda.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois asks the date of these letters, portions of which I have read. One was the 24th of April, and the other about 2 weeks earlier. No doubt a large part of this hostility and fear was occasioned by the provisions of the bill as it was drafted in its original form. The bill before us has been very much improved, but it still contains the most menacing feature of the earlier bill, namely, large and indefinite power of dictation to industry by a commission of the Federal Government.

Regarded as a stock-market bill, this is perhaps as good a bill as could be worked out in the short time that was taken in its preparation, for, after all, a few weeks is a short time for the writing of a bill to dispose of a matter of such moment.

There are some things that I think should be changed. Perhaps the margin provision should be made more elastic. Certain it is, I think, that a separate commission should be charged with the administration of the bill, and that that separate commission should be completely nonpartisan, and should have upon it a representative of industry, a representative of the exchanges, and also a representative of the people who are not connected directly either with the exchanges or with industry.

There is a provision, an absurd and dangerous provision, that any stockholder who owns 5 percent of the stock in any company must at the end of every year publish a statement telling whether he has increased or decreased his holdings, and to what extent. Nothing could be more damaging to our smaller industries, industries not listed on the big exchanges, than a provision of that kind. In any one of these smaller industries there may be half a dozen people closely associated with it, each of whom may hold 5 percent or more of the stock. Now, suppose the statement is made public that Mr. X has reduced his holdings; will not the inevitable reaction be, "Mr. X has reduced his holdings; he is closely associated with the business and must know the value of the stock; he is selling; I had better sell too." You can easily spread panic and fear among the stockholders. Being over-the-counter stock, no large market existing, values can be destroyed overnight.

Under the pretense of regulating stock exchanges there have been inserted in this bill provisions which give a commission set up in Washington, with the bureaucracy that surrounds it, absolute power over all industry, over all corporations, large and small; a commission with unlimited power to make such rules and regulations as it may see fit, over and above any which are prescribed in the bill, and those rules and regulations are not subject to review. It can call for reports and lay down rules and regulations here which will set up a financial burden upon our smaller industries which they simply cannot afford to sustain.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKEWELL. Let me finish my statement first and then I shall be glad to yield if I have the time. Our industries in Connecticut have been doing their best to support the recovery program of the administration. They have taken upon themselves burden after burden. They received a terrific shock in the tariff bill which passed this House the other day, which makes it possible to destroy an industry by Executive decree. Here comes another bill which threatens to prove the straw that will break the camel's back. We need to learn that there can be no recovery and no genuine reemployment unless and until industry is given the opportunity to thrive and prosper. It is said that by limiting the amount of money that can be loaned on the stock exchanges we are releasing so much to be loaned to industry and to agriculture. If industry and agriculture fail to get these loans at the present time, it is not because there is not ample credit, but because there is lack of confidence, because there is fear.

When a patient is seriously ill we know that to give him strong medicine after strong medicine is the way to kill him. The human constitution will not stand such treatment. It is precisely the same with the constitution of industry. We have been giving it strong medicine after strong medicine. We cannot continue this treatment without killing the patient. It is time to give the patient a rest, and to let nature get in its healing work. That is the only way in which we can possibly find our way back to normal conditions.

We have been told that this bill is a conservative bill, and that if we do not have this we shall have something much worse. That bugaboo has been presented here on many occasions as an excuse for doing things that are intrinsically wrong. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] has just said that this bill does not meet with his approval; that he would like to have it different; but that nevertheless he is going to support it. Would it not be better, since the matter is not immediately pressing, since there is no boom impending, to take time to give ample consideration to this bill and bring in one 7 months from now that does not contain those objectionable features which he has described, and which my colleague from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] had earlier so well and effectively presented for your consideration?

When this is called a conservative bill, the word "conservative" is used in the Pickwickian sense. This bill is just one more step in setting up a complete centralized bureaucratic control from Washington of the entire life of the people, and as such it certainly cannot be regarded as a conservative measure. I am reminded of the story of what happened in a New England village, in the days before the automobile, when the little farming communities were very much isolated. A farmer suddenly fell heir to some money, about $1,800. It looked like a very large sum. He had never seen as much money as that in his life, and he did not know what to do with it. But a friend told him that New York was a good place to spend money in. So he went to New York, and the inevitable happened. He fell in love with a beautiful waitress in a restaurant, and the next morning he married her and took her back to his little country home. About a year later his friend was passing that way and stopped to see him. "Hello, Bill", he said, "how are you?" The farmer replied, "Oh, I am jes' farin' along, and I'se mighty lonesome." "How is that?" said the friend, "what became of that beautiful wife you brought home from New York?" "Oh, she is daid." "Dead? How did that happen?" "You see", said the farmer, "she hadn't been here more than a month when she fell down and broke her leg, and I had to shoot her." [Laughter.]

Now, it seems to me that the provisions of this bill are going to do to industry very much what that poor old farmer did to his wife—kill it off speedily to avoid the agony of dying long drawn out.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. If this bill is enacted into law, will it not protect men and women who desire to invest money in the future in corporations?

Mr. BAKEWELL. To a large extent it will. The corrective features and the provisions that call for exact and accurate information are excellent. I am in favor of the stock-exchange control features of the bill. But there is no necessity for the second half of this bill, which sets up a Federal dictatorship over industry. To be sure, nothing can keep a fool from being parted from his money. No law that can be passed will do that. A very wise man said some years ago that the only result of legislation that tried to protect the fools from the consequences of their folly would be to people the entire world with fools.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Does the gentleman mean to infer that all the people who lost money in the stock market since 1929 were fools?

Mr. BAKEWELL. Certainly not; and a lot of them would have been saved if some of the provisions of this bill had been in force.

I want to repeat that I am not opposing the provisions to regulate the stock market. We are all for that, but I am opposed to tacking onto this bill the other half of it which has to do with the control of industry, and I think we should take time to rewrite the bill so as to eliminate the objectionable and dangerous features.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Does the gentleman think the stockholders of a corporation are or are not entitled to know whether their officers, who are in a quasi-fiduciary capacity, are writing the stock market up or down at the time they are giving out favorable or unfavorable statements as to the condition of the company?

Mr. BAKEWELL. That question has been answered above. There are provisions in this bill that are excellent, and which try to insure the recognition of the fact that the directors or other officers of a company are acting in a fiduciary capacity and have no right to take any advantage of inside information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BAKEWELL] has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MILLIGAN].

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina when he said, "In this bill you are writing a criminal code", I would say that when you delegate authority to a commission or to a board you must give authority to make those rules and regulations effective. I would say to the gentleman from North Carolina that if his statement were true, when he voted for the Securities Act he voted to write a criminal code. I would say that when he voted for the Agricultural Adjustment Act he voted for a criminal code. I would say that when he voted for the National Recovery Act he voted for a criminal code. I would also say that when he voted for the Glass-Steagall banking bill he voted for a criminal code, because those acts contain practically the same section that is carried in this bill making effective the rules and regulations of the commission.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has considered this bill for 9 weeks. A number of redrafts have been made by the committee. Hearings were held, and those in opposition to this measure were given every opportunity to appear before the committee and present their views. I want to take this opportunity to compliment the chairman, the able gentleman from Texas, for his patience and the consideration that he gave to everyone who had a meritorious suggestion to make relative to this legislation. The chairman not only permitted everyone who had suggestions to make to appear before the committee, but he privately met with the different groups of business men and others and went over the bill with them, giving consideration to all of their suggestions.

Some would lead you to believe that the object of this legislation is to punish a particular group and to destroy legitimate business. This is not a fact. Members of the committee realize that the stock exchanges are necessary as a market place for the free trading in securities. The object of this measure is to control credits, control the unfair manipulating practices, to provide for adequate and honest reports to security holders by the corporations, to control the unfair practices of officers and directors of corporations who use inside information obtained in their position of trust to enrich themselves and destroy the value of stock owned by the stockholders of their particular company.

Practically every witness who testified before the committee stated that he believed Federal regulation of stock exchanges was necessary. It is unnecessary to go into the reason for this legislation. We know from investigations that have been made that by the sale of securities, manipulation and excessive speculation, the purchasing power of the investing public has been destroyed in the sum of something near $50,000,000,000. One of the most controversial sections in this bill is the marginal-requirements section. The committee believed that this section should be elastic, lodging the authority of administration in the Federal Reserve Board. Legislative standards have been set. However, we give to the Federal Reserve Board broad descretionary powers, if it is necessary in the public interest to lower or raise these standards. It is provided that when an initial loan is made the borrower shall put up 45 percent of the current market value of the securities or 100 percent of the lowest market price during the preceding 3 years, but in no case more than 75 percent of the current market price.

In order to prevent any deflationary effects from this legislation, the effective date of this legislation relative to loans now in effect or the renewal of those loans is postponed until January 31, 1939.

During this debate the gentleman from New York suggested in his remarks a desire on his part to exclude loans by banks from the marginal provision. As I view this matter, it would be fatal to set one standard for the broker and one standard for the banker. If no marginal requirements were set for the banks it would put the broker out of business, or if a lower marginal requirement was made for the banks than for the broker, all of the loans would be made by the banks and no loans by the broker. The same standard, as I view the situation, must apply to the broker as well as to the banker. Of course, this marginal requirement only applies when the loan is made for the purchase of securities. If an individual has securities and he desires to obtain a loan from a bank not for the purchase of additional securities but for other purposes, the bank can loan as much as it sees fit on the collateral.

The talk that requiring decent reports to stockholders by listed companies constitutes Government regimentation of every small business in the country is unusual to come from the mouths of the great investment banking firms in New York City—Morgan's, and Kuhn-Loeb, and Lehmann Bros., and the rest, who govern and are fighting for, and are trying to fool business men into fighting for, the New York Stock Exchange. The great regimenters of business in the United States, the great destroyers of a sound industrial democracy in the United States, are those firms themselves—that use the stock exchanges to float huge holding companies, which swallow up all the independent, moderate-sized businesses in the United States, and fill the boards of directors of these great holding corporations with directors and management whom they choose, and who report to them and who make available to them long before the information is available to stockholders, if it ever becomes available at all, the most intimate details of the affairs of these corporations.

One of the witnesses before the House committee, a partner in a great New York banking house, testified that as a director he represented his banking house on the boards of 17 great corporations. All this bill does is require that the public which buys into the securities of these great listed corporations, and which puts up the money for their operation, should know at least a small part of the information which at the present time is freely available only to these banking houses that put up practically none of the money but gain control of boards of directors through underwriting contracts. Why should not the American public which owns these great listed companies know a little about the way they are run, when the investment banking houses which own only a few shares of a class A management stock and who made a profit out of selling the public these same securities control the boards of directors and the management and know all about the affairs of these corporations? This bill offers the beginning of a hope that possibly the public which bought the securities of American industry may get back control of its companies from the bankers who sold the companies to the public.

It has been suggested that an amendment will be offered creating a new commission for the administration of this legislation. It seems to me that the logical board to administer this bill is the Federal Trade Commission, due to the fact that this is a companion bill of the Securities Act. That Commission has already obtained a great deal of information relative to securities that have been issued. Therefore, it will be unnecessary for them to call for additional information. It has a trained staff of experts, and I can see no logical reason why the administration of this act should not be lodged in that Commission with the addition of two new members, providing the Commission can create a separate division to administer this legislation.

The Federal Trade Commission has been reorganized under President Roosevelt's administration. He, of course, would have the appointing power of a new commission, and I do not believe in tying the hands of the President, whether he be Democrat or Republican, as to whom he should appoint on any commission or board, as I have full confidence in the President that he will appoint men of outstanding ability to administer this or any other act. If this provision of the bill is retained, the Federal Trade Commission with its present staff will be able to organize the administration of the act 6 months sooner than any new board or commission that might be set up.

This, of course, must be a very technical bill, due to the fact that the practices in dealing in securities on the stock exchange are very complicated. It is necessary that this legislation cover these transactions in full. The committee considered this bill section by section. It has spent a great deal of time upon it, and I think it would be unwise to attempt to amend this bill on the floor of the House. I feel sure that all amendments that will be offered have been considered by the committee. Because of the intricate provisions of this bill I think it would be unwise to adopt any amendments on the floor of the House where we cannot give them proper consideration. In my opinion this measure will not injure legitimate business or legitimate transactions on the stock exchanges. It will, however, revive confidence of the investing public in the stock exchanges as well as in securities. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, the story told by the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut about the shotgun is quite applicable to the bill. There are a lot of financial buzzards down on Wall Street who ought to be shot and who will be shot financially by this bill.

I am for this bill because it is doing something to Wall Street instead of doing something for Wall Street. I am for this bill, because it will do something to the bloodiest band of racketeers and vampires that ever sucked the blood of humanity, John "Pirate" Morgan & Co. If all the tears and the blood that he has caused to flow could be gathered together into ine pool it would be deep enough and large enough to float his $3,000,000 yacht, the Corsair, and the private yachts of all his fellow pirates.

Something has been said about teeth and tusks in this bill. Both of them are too light for me. I would equip this bill with triple-plated, copper-riveted, razor-honed spear points steeped in the poison of the deadliest snakes of India.

No one has a greater sympathy for industry than I, but as for the marauding speculators, not only would I regulate them but I would put them out of business; and I think this law will accomplish that end. [Applause.]

During the consideration of this bill by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I have received many letters and telegrams, so many, in fact, that it has been impossible to acknowledge any great percentage of them. I am listing herewith some of the names taken at random, whom I have been unable to reply to personally because of limitations of time, human endurance, and stenographic force.

I hope to be able to have this speech printed, so that I may send each one of these gentlemen and ladies a copy, that he or she may consider these remarks as a complete acknowledgment of his or her protest.

One well-meaning but misinformed constituent of mine is concerned over the enactment of this bill because he thinks it will be a repetition of the prohibition blunder. He says:

I wish to voice my protest against the enactment of the National Securities Exchange Act of 1934 as it now stands. While it has been rewritten and one or two sections have been modified, I still feel that social-reform legislation should not be attempted at a time when business conditions are in a turmoil. The enactment of the eighteenth amendment at a like time proved disastrous, and the Securities Act of 1933 has kept business from forging ahead by the inability of domestic corporations to borrow the needed capital to expand and buy much-needed materials.

His intentions are good, but his vision has been clouded by the propaganda of the Wall Street crowd.

A manufacturer of Cleveland, Ohio, wires me that he is strongly opposed to this bill—

On account of the provisions which will interfere with proper and lawful conduct of our business, and give control of listed corporations to the Federal Trade Commission.

Here is another case of good intention but mistaken judgment.

A voter of Muskogee, Okla., writes me and says that—

The people seem to be up against it for protective legislation by Congress.

I do not agree with the gentleman.

The present bill, as a measure for the protection of the common people, is only comparable to the Banking Act of 1933 and the Securities Act. He says that he wants to give his Congressman and Senator "hell" when he gets a chance, for their contributions to this act. I am sure that when he understands the bill thoroughly he will want to withdraw that statement. He says that present reports out his way state that "New York Stock Exchange 'workers' steering committee' estimate that 1,000,000 individuals throughout the country would be adversely affected by the adoption of the Fletcher-Rayburn bill in its present form", and adds, "Now, isn't that too bad?" He is keen enough to observe that 75,000,000 individuals throughout the country have already been adversely affected to the extent of 60 to 90 percent of their life's savings invested in so-called "securities" listed on that market with its unethical and dishonest practices.

The American people want to know who owns this Government? After the enactment of the Fletcher-Rayburn bill into law, the Wall Street burglars will know that somebody is running it besides themselves. They are perfectly willing to be regulated, so they say, as long as they can write the regulations. They are willing to observe law and order providing they can write the law and dictate the order.

Here is a misguided soul from Cleveland, Ohio, who says that as a voter he wants to protest the pending stock-exchange regulation bill. He thinks that such a measure, if enacted into law, can only work great harm to all of us concerned. My answer is, it certainly will not work any great harm to the millions of American investors who lost $65,000,000 during the crash of 1929, while the Wall Street brokers—the Dillingers of Wall Street—made $2,000,000,000 off of these people whom they now call suckers and fools.

Among the big-shot protestors I find the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., the B. F. Goodrich Co., and the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., of Akron, Ohio. These companies protest against certain provisions of the bill that we are now considering. They say that section 11 would require corporations with listed stock to agree in advance to comply with any future rules and regulations that might be subsequently issued by a regulatory commission. They say, further, that this is an unnecessary and improper extension of power; burdensome and unnecessary reports are required by the bill in its present form.

My good friends, that is exactly what the farmers of this country are saying about the burdensome regulations that are placed upon them by the provisions of the A.A.A., the love baby of the United States Chamber of Commerce, as indicated in the recent statement of Dr. Raymond Moley. The good doctor says that this is not the conception of farm leaders, as we have been told, but of the swivel-chair farmers who farm the farmers and whose address is Wall Street, U.S.A.

The rubber manufacturers also object to certain other sections of the bill. They believe that it will diminish the liquidity of securities and hamper the acquisition of new capital. Again, these gentlemen, even though they represent the largest rubber factories in the world, have been bamboozled by the Wall Street sharks. There is nothing in this bill that will adversely affect the sale of bonds and legitimate stocks in securities and the various types of rubber goods which they manufacture.

Another industry in Ohio fears that the bill contains provisions so drastic and detrimental to corporations that their existence is jeopardized. Our answer to that is: In the past the magic and legerdemain of the Wall Street speculators and manipulators was so drastic and detrimental to farmers, wage workers, war veterans, and small business men that they are all broke.

Here is a good one. It comes from Mr. J. Clydesdale Cushman, president of Cushman & Wakefield, Inc., New York City. This gentleman pathetically avers that it means the dismissal of 26 employees in one branch office and of additional clerks in their main office. In holy terror, he opines that this is only the forerunner of hundreds of notifications inspired by the threat of the proposed bill to regulate stock exchanges, which owners in his city will receive. He says further that his corporation alone have in buildings, under their management, 30 stock-brokerage firms. The closing of their offices will not only throw out of employment hundreds of white-collar workers, but building owners who house such tenants will be forced to cut down their maintenance staffs, obviously defeating the President's aims of N.R.A. I find it impossible to swallow all that this gentleman says, even though he may mean well.

When we repealed the eighteenth amendment, hundreds of bootleggers were thrown out of employment and now must seek jobs in legitimate industry. This legislation may, and no doubt will, throw out of employment hundreds and perhaps thousands of bootlegger brokers and operators of bucket shops who "milked" the public by authority of law for the past decade.

A much better slant on this bill comes from W. H. Schisler, chairman of the committee of the Grange at Reynoldsburg, Ohio. Friend Schisler urges me to support the Fletcher-Rayburn bill, which, he says, will control gambling in food products, stock, and bonds. Thank you for your contribution, Brother Schisler; you are right, and I am voting your way.

One gentleman from Cleveland, Ohio, fears that corporations will be filled with dummy directors. I must say to my dear friend that the Pecora investigation last summer developed the fact that old John "Pirate" Morgan owned about $40,000,000,000 worth of the corporations in this country, that he paid no taxes, and that his directors were not only dummy directors, but crooks as well.

One large industrialist says that his objections are many, but he wants to call my particular attention to the various clauses of the bill which are particularly harmful. He fails to mention, however, the paragraphs to which he refers. Hence, I am unable to pass judgment. Personally, I have been unable to find any objectionable clauses myself. His first objection, he admits later, is, "Against the principle involving the policing of a great industry by the Federal Government." I must inform my honorable and well-meaning constituent that this bill will not in the slightest extent attempt to police the honest business practices of such industries as his. It will, however, not only police, but place behind the bars the bloody butchers of Wall Street who have lived in high style on the blood of the common people. This gentleman concludes his letter by saying, "Should this bill ever be put up to vote, we expect to find your name in the 'no' column." It gratifies me to be able to inform the gentleman that, when the roll is called, my vote shall be "aye" in the loudest voice at my command.

Here is another New York City constituent of mine. Of course he is opposed to the bill but he stresses the importance of keeping the existing system working while we reform it, or we will find ourselves without an adequate investment system. That is precisely our trouble now. In the debate on this floor this day it was agreed to unanimously that the trouble with all business, big and little, is the need for a relaxation in credit.

Naturally, most of these communications come from the cities. One from Cleveland, on plain stationery, which indicates the gentleman has been inspired to write this letter by the propagandist, offers the suggestion that a bill having such profound effect on our economic system should be put through very slowly and only after a long period of careful consideration.

Well, as I understand it, the committee has devoted 7 weeks of hard, ceaseless labor to this bill. Naturally, in its present form, it does not suit the Wall Street gamblers. The committee might take 7 years to consider the bill, and they would be no nearer drafting a bill that would meet the approval of these racketeers. The gentleman in question humbly suggests that this bill be postponed until the next session of Congress, so that a rational and workable bill may be formulated. This would suit the New York plunder bunds perfectly, since it would give them one more open season to complete the slaughter of the innocents.

I do not question the honesty of purpose nor the sincerity of my constituents in the State of Ohio and without who have communicated with me on the Fletcher-Rayburn bill, which proposes to do something to the moneyed aristocracy and something for the struggling masses of farmers, war veterans, wageworkers, small business men, and producers.

I fear that some of them have become unduly excited through reading the vicious propaganda of the "toreadors" of the Wall Street "bull ring." We are told that a $200,000 slush fund was raised to misinform the American people, to delude them, to ensnare them into the clutches of the Wall Street gamblers, and to intimidate, harangue, and bulldoze the Congress of the United States so that they will not pass this bill, which may be called a new "declaration of independence", a declaration of independence from the long, bony talons of the swindlers on the New York Stock Exchange. Such swindlers as Thomas Lamont, Morgan's "sidekick", who in the Pecora investigation last summer clung to Morgan's side like a pestiferous flea to a mangy cayuse.

Under the sharp questioning and pointed barbs of Ferdinand Pecora, whenever "Morgan the Magnificent's" memory was bad, it was his able aide, Lamont, who refreshed his memory. Such swindlers as the suave, blasé, perfectly manicured George Whitney, who, when asked a pointed leading question, would tilt his aristocratic head with all of the nonchalance and composure of a Webster declaiming messages that would be written in the immortal tablets of history, "The answer will be——." Elegant and arrogant though Whitney was, his own admissions convicted him of being one of the coldest and cruelest of all the Bluebeards.

Then there were the Kuhn-Loebs, the Dillon-Reeds, leaving a slimy trail of legalized burglary, rotten riggings of markets, and feculent odors of grand larceny that led from coast to coast and Gulf to Lakes, and smelled to high heaven.

An army of 5,000 is chasing Dillinger. Yet the Wall Street bandits still run at large, feeding on the hard-earned savings of honest American citizens. So the more stringent Government supervision made of the operations and dealings of these hijackers that much better the interests of the country generally will be served.

That any measure designed for this purpose will have the approval of the Wall Street interests is too ridiculous to be given serious consideration. The propaganda they have loosed on the country is either motivated by abysmal ignorance or a pernicious desire to deceive a sorely punished but still gullible group of investors.

One deluded soul writes me that the present weakness in the market is directly attributable to the hearings on the Fletcher-Rayburn bill, and he further deposes and saith that "this weakness is insignificant in comparison with the general collapse that will occur once its passage is assured." He objects to the margins that this bill requires. Evidently he is one of the gamblers. Naturally, his gambling operations will be restricted, hence the spleen he displays in opposing this bill.

Here is the manager of one of the largest industrial corporations in the country, who writes me that this bill will give the Federal Trade Commission power to interfere with financing capital needs, thus preventing the extension of industry and the restoration of employment. He says that the portion of the bill dealing with the Federal Trade Commission's power to further regulate the management of all corporations is, in his judgment, "unnecessary" and "will seriously affect the interest of stockholders and greatly retard recovery." He thinks that no additional legislation covering corporations should be required, in view of the N.I.R.A. and the many other Federal statutes already on the books.

Now, the gentleman is wholly mistaken in his apprehensions. His vast industrial enterprise, which manufactures a necessary home, business, and industrial commodity, namely, hot-water and steam-heating plants, will not be jeopardized or penalized by the provisions of this bill. He is seeing bogey men. He is seeing ghosts in the dark, and I am sure, after the passage of this bill, he will sleep much better than he does now.

Here is a typical example of the inspired letters from employees. As this man sees it, "the bill will destroy the free and open market necessary for the determination of values." This, as we know it, is the gambling market. Then he goes on to state that its marginal requirements place the purchase of stock beyond reach of the ordinary individual. In my judgment, that is a strong feature of the bill. Let people who want stocks and securities buy them outright and stop gambling.

The most damnable gambling den, the most voracious gamblers, and the most craven despoilers of the common people are the grain racketeers on the Chicago Board of Trade. These fellows buy and sell daily millions of bushels of corn and wheat and oats and rye and barley that they never own or ever hope to own. Most of them would not recognize a good Ohio corn field if they met one in the middle of the road. Yet they still carry on their legalized poker game. Like the New York brokers they own the "kitty" or the slot in the top of the poker table where the rake off is dropped in for every hand that is played. Poker players will well understand what I am saying. Others may inquire.

But it is always the old army game of "heads I win, and tails you lose." Regardless of whether the markets go up or down, irrespective of whether the bulls have their day or the bears are on the offensive, the owners of the "kitty", the brokers who receive the commissions, count their share of the plunger each day the sun rises and sets.

I would go much farther if given the privilege of drafting this bill. I would make it a criminal offense to gamble or speculate in any of the food commodities of life or the clothing commodities of life, such as cotton.

Naturally all of the great trusts and monopolies, the tariff barons, the bond grabbers, and others fattening at the expense of the people are opposed to this bill. The question we have to decide is whether $200,000 contributed by the eastern boodlers can corrupt an outraged public and influence the people's Congress. The answer is "no."

Shall the lamb put confidence in the wolf, and the fly accept the unctuous invitation of the spider to walk into his parlor. Never. We prefer to judge the future by the past. We see the cloven hoofs beneath the angelic robes of these suave hypocrites. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STUDLEY].

Mr. STUDLEY. Mr. Chairman, Wall Street is in my district, so is Main Street. I must do justice to both.

Somebody ought to tell the truth about Wall Street.

Why wreak vengeance on Wall Street?

By passing this bill you will not reach the malefactors of great wealth whom you so zealously desire to punish.

Instead of reaching them, your wrath will fall impotently on an army of real-estate owners, of bookkeepers, clerks, stenographers, stockholders, and bondholders, who will be thrown out of employment, or who will fail to collect their incomes, and so you will add to the sum of human misery and unemployment.

When you want to get money to build your roads, pave your streets, lay out a city park, install waterworks, or build a levee, where do you go for it? To Wall Street.

Obligingly and courteously Wall Street underwrites your stock and bond issues. For three generations of America Wall Street has furnished the money to build your railroads and develop your country. Wall Street has paved your streets, built your highways, installed your waterworks and reservoirs, drained your swamps and lowlands, built your irrigation and levee systems, and financed the upbuilding and advancement of every municipality from Maine to Mexico.

Why not be fair with Wall Street?

When default comes in payment of interest and principal of these debts and Wall Street politely asks for the money past due, then Wall Street is Shylock! And Wall Street has been a heavy loser, too.

Now, this is not fair. It is not even decent.

It is what Europe told the United States after the war when we asked for payment of the debts.

I earnestly trust that this stock-market regulation law will not ultimately develop into just another noble experiment.

At the time of the enactment of the eighteenth amendment and the prohibition laws the Congress erred gravely in following the clamor of the people. The Congress should then have been able to apply restraint on a movement that had got out of control and was in a run-away. But the Congress did not apply restraint. Indeed, not! It yielded impotently to the lashings which were being then so vigorously administered by our constituencies. The people were then demanding that we smash the saloon. The cry was, "Down with the saloon!" "Smash the saloon!" The saloon was the personal devil on whose trail every man and woman was in hot pursuit.

We smashed it, too. It was the spirit of the times. It was a holy crusade.

The drys carried State after State with smashing majorities and voted dry amendments into State constitutions long before national prohibition came to pass. Since then we have seen the light. We have retraced our steps. There is no law greater than the people.

The innate desire for gain, to trade, to speculate, to try and make some money is as deep-seated in the human heart as is the human appetite.

It is as old as the human race itself. To control it is quite beyond the powers of an act of Congress. The Congress, with all its vast and far-reaching powers, is impotent to cope with such deep-seated human impulses, and its puny efforts to do so will result in disaster, as did that other noble experiment. We cannot break the economic laws. We shall only dash ourselves to pieces against them. Wall Street is now the personal devil on whose trail the country is in hot pursuit. The cry now is, "Down with Wall Street!" "Smash Wall Street!"

To scourge the money changers out of the temple is a fine piece of rhetoric; nothing more. That phrase has lost its virility and its meaning with the ages. It can't be done.

A few years ago a man was bent on destroying Wall Street. He would bring about its ruin even as Tyre and Sidon.

He exploded a huge bomb at the corner of Broad and Wall Streets.

The result was some panes of glass were broken in the New York Stock Exchange, and a famous banking house on that corner and many clerks, stenographers, and bookkeepers were blown to bits. But Wall Street remained.

Wall Street is just another name for the great business organizations and activities of the country. The torrents of commerce and trade not only of America but of the world go roaring through Wall Street. It is a market place, no more.

There may have been dishonest trading and practice in Wall Street. I know of no business that has always been found following the precepts of the Golden Rule.

Why destroy Wall Street? The only way to do it is to strike down the business structure of the country. Do you want to do that? It would be rash, it would be radical to do it. Don't strike down the business.

If the Congress does it more than a billion dollars worth of real estate south of Fulton Street in Manhattan alone will become unproductive and tenantless. More than a hundred thousand people in New York City would be thrown out of employment and into the bread lines. The business of the country would suffer irreparable injury and recovery would be indefinitely retarded. And Wall Street pays taxes.

In 1918 we would make it impossible for any person to get a drink of liquor. Did we do it? We did not.

In 1918 we would abolish the saloon. Did we do it? We did not.

Instead of the saloon came the speakeasy and the bootlegger. Appetite and long-established customs of our people made that law impotent. It was regarded everywhere as a joke.

The revenue that should have gone into our Treasury was dried up and diverted to speak-easy and bootleg channels, and was there used to finance racketeers, highjackers, robbers, and kidnapers. The most successful chain of crime the country has ever seen was financed by this folly of the Congress. But without customers there would have been no bootleggers.

Now, we are not legislating here to reach just a lot of bad boys who can be spanked and put into the corners and told to stay there. We are dealing with the most resolute and resourceful element of our people. We shall find the operators of Wall Street good sportsmen who will always be ready to pay a reasonable tax on its business. Give and take is their gospel. A mayor of New York once tried to put Wall Street in irons. But he did not. He failed.

The Congress will not be able to put Wall Street in irons. When we try to do that Wall Street will go to Canada, where they will be welcomed. Our most prolific source of revenue will be dried up and our business structure reduced to ashes; and again we shall find ourselves the victims of our own folly. Our people will continue to trade and speculate through bootleg channels and the act of Congress to put Wall Street in irons will be just another impotent gesture and of no avail. Then we shall retrace our steps in pathos and humiliation, as we have lately done with prohibition, and as we have done before a thousand, thousand times.

Laws are discovered, not made.

And presently the people will compel us to return to the political philosophy and the economics of Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill.

The doctrine and the practice of laissez-faire has not yet perished from the earth.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This act may be cited as the "National Securities Exchange Act of 1934."

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, one of the interesting features of the debate on this bill has been the denunciation of the first bill, or the first several bills, because of their severity. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] detailed his many objections to the first bill, and the distinguished chairman of the committee himself, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], than whom there is no more intelligent man in the House, also referred to the objections to the first bill. The chairman of the committee also referred to the lobby that was apparently objecting to the present bill.

Mr. Chairman, why would there not be a lobby? Why would there not be objections when there are 10,000,000 investors in the United States who are affected by this legislation, which in its original form was a monstrosity? That is the reason it has been rewritten, rewritten, and rewritten by the scarlet-fever boys down in the little red house in Georgetown.

Only day before yesterday, when the distinguished chairman was addressing the House, he paid compliment to his visitors in the gallery from the stock exchange. Today I pay compliment to my visitors in the gallery, the youthful legislative wizards from the little red house in Georgetown. They are here to assist in the passage of this important bill, in the drafting of which they have played such an important role. They wrote and rewrote the bills which have been subjected to such merciless criticism from every section of the country. Of course, they should be here following the action of the House on their pet legislative baby.

Everybody is for regulation of the stock market. Nobody would say otherwise; but under the guise of regulation of the stock market these gentlemen have written complicated and very intricate language which will control every industry in the United States directly or indirectly; and they will control it by rules. Are you gentlemen going to stand for that? Why, of course you are not.

You should not complain because a small number of 10,000,000 investors write us and say, "For God's sake protect my investment." Should we complain? Who has a better right? Each of us has received letters from all over the United States complaining about this bill. Through the operations of the provisions of this bill there can be destroyed if desired any industry in the United States by a rule, or a constantly changing set of rules from which there is practically no appeal.

I have been told that our young leader, Benjamin Victor Cohen, is now on the floor of the House. Why not let him stay? He wrote most of this legislation and should be permitted to remain on the floor during its deliberation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think we might as well settle that now. I shall not object to the gentleman having more time. Frankly, I think the chairmen of committees in times past have been allowed to have an expert sit with them. It was done a year ago when the securities bill was passed. I know the gentleman from Illinois said he would not object.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I may say that in times past it has been customary for one of the legislative counsel only to assist during the consideration of a bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. The drafting service always sits in.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. He is not a regular drafting clerk, and he is not attached to the committee.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am sorry that I started all this, because I truly believe that no one on the floor understands this legislation as does the boyish Mr. Cohen.

Mr. RAYBURN. Now that the subject has been brought up, I desire to know whether there is objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am sure there will be objection on the part of four or five over on this side.

Mr. BRITTEN. I think the gentleman should be permitted to remain. May I state what occurred here some years ago?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not think the members of the committee on the Republican side who are in sympathy with this legislation will object to Mr. Cohen's staying here.

Mr. BRITTEN. We had on the floor of the House several years ago a very complicated naval personnel bill. The bill was exceedingly complicated, and had been written by the personnel experts of the Navy Department who knew every word of it. I brought onto the floor a member of the Navy Department, Rear Admiral Latimer, to sit with the committee in order to advise with us. It was a Democratic House and a Democratic committee. The present Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] was seated right back here, and he objected to the man being on the floor of the House, and he was compelled to leave.

I told the chairman of the committee [Mr. RAYBURN] a while ago that I would have no objection to Mr. Cohen being on the floor. I think he ought to be here. The language in this bill is very complicated, and the chairman of the committee, one of the most industrious men in Congress or on Capitol Hill, cannot possibly comprehend all of the intricacies carried in this legislation, and for the benefit of the House someone who can interpret the language ought to be permitted to sit here on the floor. I hope the gentlemen on this side will not object to Mr. Cohen being permitted to stay here.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, the Rayburn bill for the regulation of securities exchanges which is being considered today was conceived in the little red house in Georgetown and borne to the Capitol on last Friday. It is the fifth and probably the last bill for the regimentation of the country's industries that will come from the youthful intellectuals who have framed most of the so-called "planned legislation" during the present session of Congress. While the popular demand for a rigid regulation of the stock markets is the smoke screen employed by the inexperienced directors of the Government, the real object of the bill is to Russianize everything worth while under the unqualified and unprepared Federal Trade Commission, an act that would make that Commission the most powerful and far-reaching arm of the Federal Government. It could dictate the conduct of officers, directors, and even stockholders of corporations; its requirement for balance sheets, monthly reports, and other accounting data would cost the Nation hundreds of millions of dollars a year, and for no particular purpose; it is given an indirect but very effective control over the investment of all capital by the industries, whether their outstanding securities are registered or not.

The scarlet-fever boys have written into the Rayburn bill an unusual section which in itself is in the nature of an argument for doing the unconstitutional things which the bill itself is intended to circumvent.

The popular demand for stock-exchange regulation has given the Prof. Felix Frankfurter cheer leaders a vehicle to control all credit and corporate practices such as not even Russia can boast of today. The boys in the little red house breathed easier when their child was finally deposited in the congressional hopper by Chairman RAYBURN.

I am told that Telford Taylor, a young and recent graduate from Harvard, now in the Interior Department, was the father of the very first Fletcher-Rayburn child, but it was soon kidnaped by Landis (F.T.C.) and Frankfurter (H.U.), who immediately proceeded with the advice of Pecora, Tommy Corcoran (R.F.C.), and Benjamin Cohen (P.W.A.), to put the finishing touches on what was intended to be the second child; too much vodka and too little cream made it too hot for even the red-letter boys, and it was again rewritten only to be drowned in the sea of publicity.

If the present unhappy child should be adopted by Congress, the Federal Trade Commission could restrict the operation of almost every industry in the United States and could regulate it out of existence by the control of credit and other restrictions without having to give its reasons for doing so. Lenin and Trotsky never envisioned such far-reaching possibilities for strangulation.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Has the gentleman read the hearings?

Mr. BRITTEN. How many pages are there to the hearings?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Just the first part.

Mr. BRITTEN. No; there are about 1,500 pages. I have read the report and I have read the bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. If the gentleman will read the hearings he will see, in about the first 10 or 11 pages, I think, of the hearings, the information as to who wrote the first bill. I asked the question myself, and it was not written by any young man just out of Harvard.

Mr. BRITTEN. But the gentleman never saw the first bill. He only saw the second bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I saw the first bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. I congratulate him upon his initiative and energy. He is a most valuable Member of the House.

May I proceed further? When the chairman of this very important committee took the floor the other day, followed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], the speeches of those two gentlemen cost the investment holders of the United States more than $100,000,000 in depreciation that afternoon. Fifteen important stocks reached a new low level that day, and the same situation followed the next day, and they are doing it again today.

The people of the country are desperately afraid of any legislation that may emanate from the little red house in Georgetown, and rightfully so. They are afraid of any commission, particularly the Federal Trade Commission, because it will be dominated by someone who has no kindly interest in the stock exchange. The people know that, and that is what they are afraid of. A man who by rule or regulation can put the industries out of business overnight if he wants to should be a very carefully selected individual. That is the reason the people are afraid, and the complaints that have been received by Members on both sides of the aisle have not come from stockbrokers. They have come from investors who want their little investment protected, and God knows they have been scaled down enough in the last 3 or 4 years, many of them with a few shares of stock in some excellent corporation. The people are concerned about this Commission, and they do not want on that Commission a man who has lost a lot of money in the last 3 or 4 years and who has publicly said he would put the stock market out of commission if he could.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman mention his name?

Mr. BRITTEN. Let us not get into personalities. I never have on the floor.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman tell me his name?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will tell the gentleman in the cloakroom; yes.

The second section of the bill should be taken out entirely, because it is an argument for a violation of the Constitution. It is not necessary to be in the bill. The argument takes up several pages telling why this legislation is necessary. I have never heard of such a thing in a piece of legislation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois ought to know all about what goes on in the little red house that has been conjured up in his brain recently, because I do not think that he will deny that he has a Republican constituent who resides there.

Mr. BRITTEN. If I have a Republican constituent who resides there, I do not know it. Will the gentleman give me his name?

Mr. BLANTON. The one I have in mind is Mr. Charles Stewart Guthrie, whom I am informed is a Republican, and he hails from Chicago, and he sojourns in the little red house in Georgetown, which has preyed so heavily upon the mind of our good friend from Chicago recently. I took it for granted that our friend knows all about what goes on there. The gentleman is not as well versed as I thought.

Mr. BRITTEN. I have never been invited to the little red house in Georgetown. It is the seat of much so-called "planned legislation."

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is not as well informed as I thought he was, but I think he is the last man on earth who ought to complain about any chairman of a committee having the assistance of experts at the table during the consideration of the bill. All the time he was chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee every bill he brought in here was written by some admiral down in the Navy Department [laughter], and he had to have a bevy of admirals up in the gallery every time he brought a measure up for consideration. He is well versed in that.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment.

Mr. BRITTEN. I want to correct the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, but I do not want to take more than 5 minutes.

The gentleman is continually talking about the "brain trust" helping to write bills. I wonder if the gentleman has ever thought about the advisability of getting some "brain truster" to help him make a speech here on the floor of the House. [Laughter.] Talking about the chairman of this committee, there is not a more experienced legislator in this House than my colleague from Texas, SAM RAYBURN. He has presided as speaker over the house of representatives of his own State, that could swallow both Illinois and Chicago without suffering indigestion. He knows as much about legislating, I guess, as any man in this Congress. He can write a bill himself if he wants to. We who want bills properly written do not have somebody on the outside write them. Committees go to the legislative drafting service and tell them exactly what they want to put in the legislation, and they have that service prepare the measure in proper legislative form to bring on the floor of the House so it will be in proper order.

There is not a more brilliant mind in this House, even though I have disagreed with him on one or two subjects, than the gentleman from New York, Dr. SIROVICH; and even when he brings in a bill, he possibly got Dr. Copeland and Dr. Tugwell to help write it for him. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIROVICH. I appreciate the implied compliment paid to me by my militant and aggressive friend and colleague from Texas, TOM BLANTON. However, let me advise the courageous crusader from the Lone Star State that all the world loves a fighter, particularly if he is fighting for an ideal, for a principle, for justice, and for liberty. Whenever you are speaking on the floor of this House, your constituency can rest assured that you are battling for one of these ideals.

For the past 8 years it has been my privilege to differ with you in many matters of public interest. Our difference has been on subjects on which any honorable men might disagree. However, in all of our controversies and conflicting disagreements the honorable gentleman has been uniformly gracious, sympathetic, and just.

However, I want to make a very vigorous and strenuous objection to one of his remarks just made.

I have always drafted my own bills. I have never availed myself of the legislative drafting department of Congress to prepare my bills but have uniformly written every bill that I have introduced in the Congress of the United States.

My food and drug bill (H.R. 7426), which I elaborated, perfected, and developed, is the product of my own thoughts and, outside of my secretary, I have had no cooperation from any outside agency. My bill differs completely from the Tugwell-Copeland bill in principle, in language, and in construction, and in the ideals I would like to see achieved. My bill would eliminate any ingredients that are deleterious and poisonous in food, drugs, beverages, or cosmetics that would be likely to prove harmful or injurious to the average human system when used internally or applied externally.

I think it is the duty of the gentleman from Texas, knowing that he wants to be fair, to have his erroneous impressions corrected. My bill is as different from the Tugwell-Copeland bill as is my personality from that of TOM BLANTON, of Texas. With this explanation, TOM BLANTON, we can again meet upon the level and part upon the square.

Mr. BLANTON. I was joking my friend about Drs. Tugwell and Copeland.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. I do not know anyone for whom I personally entertain greater admiration and respect than the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. I have differed with the gentleman over and over again, but I admire his sincerity and courage, but sometimes he does me an injustice. I have written my own bill and have been up until 2 o'clock in the morning for 7 weeks drafting the food and drug bill to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. BLANTON. My friend knows that I am unalterably opposed to the so-called "Tugwell bill", and I was merely joking when I referred to his bill. We, of course, all know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] wrote his own bill, and so did the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce write its bill.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am sorry.

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentleman always likes to be corrected and I know the gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. BLANTON. Very well; go ahead.

Mr. SIROVICH. I want the gentleman to know there is absolutely no similarity between the Tugwell-Copeland bill and the Dr. Sirovich bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad to hear it, because if they were alike, there would not be a chance on earth for you to pass your bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be given 5 additional minutes. I may want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the question? I am ready to answer it.

Mr. BRITTEN. I may ask it a little later.

Mr. BLANTON. I have an answer for you before you ask it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] recently has been obsessed with two very decided vagaries of mind. One is that he has been bothering about a little red house in Georgetown, and the other is that he thinks it is up to him, out of all the people on the face of the globe, every day to get up here and twist the lion's tail. Why, a very prominent newspaper service in a report of yesterday spelled his name "Mr. B-r-i-t-a-i-n." [Laughter.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is the gentleman referring to an Associated Press report from England, where they said that Congressman "Britain" had requested the recall of their consul general?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Well, I am going to bring suit against Great Britain for that libel. That is not the way I spell my name. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say that you could collect your money if you got judgment, because Great Britain is good for her debts, and I still maintain she is going to pay us. She is not going to pay the gentleman from Illinois because he is not going to prevail in any libel suit. I think they would probably reconvene against the gentleman from Illinois in that suit and claim damages for using the name of Great Britain when he is not entitled to do it. [Laughter.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NECESSITY FOR REGULATION AS PROVIDED IN THIS ACT

SEC. 2. For the reasons hereinafter enumerated, transactions in securities as commonly conducted upon securities exchanges and over-the-counter markets are affected with a national public interest which makes it necessary to provide for regulation and control of such transactions and of practices and matters related thereto, including transactions by officers, directors, and principal security holders, to require appropriate reports, and to impose requirements necessary to make such regulation and control reasonably complete and effective, in order to protect interstate commerce, the national credit, the Federal taxing power, to protect and make more effective the national banking and Federal Reserve System, and to insure the maintenance of fair and honest markets in such transactions:

(1) Such transactions (a) are carried on in large volume by the public generally and in large part originate outside the States in which the exchanges and over-the-counter markets are located and/or are effected by means of the mails and instrumentalities of interstate commerce; (b) constitute an important part of the current of interstate commerce; (c) involve in large part the securities of issuers engaged in interstate commerce; (d) involve the use of credit, directly affect the financing of trade, industry, and transportation in interstate commerce, and directly affect and influence the volume of interstate commerce; and affect the national credit.

(2) The prices established and offered in such transactions are generally disseminated and quoted throughout the United States and foreign countries as a basis for determining and establishing the prices at which securities are bought and sold, the amount of certain taxes owing to the United States and to the several States by owners, buyers, and sellers of securities, and the value of collateral for bank loans.

(3) Frequently the prices of securities on such exchanges and markets are susceptible to manipulation and control, and the dissemination of such prices gives rise to excessive speculation, resulting in sudden and unreasonable fluctuations in the prices of securities which (a) cause alternately unreasonable expansion and unreasonable contraction of the volume of credit available for trade, transportation, and industry in interstate commerce, (b) hinder the proper appraisal of the value of securities and thus prevent a fair calculation of taxes owing to the United States and to the several States by owners, buyers, and sellers of securities, and (c) prevent the fair valuation of collateral for bank loans and/or obstruct the effective operation of the national banking and Federal Reserve Systems.

(4) National emergencies, which produce wide-spread unemployment and the dislocation of trade, transportation, and industry, and which burden interstate commerce and adversely affect the general welfare, are precipitated, intensified, and prolonged by manipulation and sudden and unreasonable fluctuations of security prices and by excessive speculation on such exchanges and markets, and to meet such emergencies the Federal Government is put to such great expense as to burden the national credit.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do so for the purpose of asking the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE]. I should like to say a little more about his proposed amendment for a stock-exchange commission rather than to have the industries and the stock exchanges and everything else controlled by a rule under the Federal Trade Commission. There are many Members on both sides of the aisle who feel as I do—not necessarily as to details, but along that line—and I am wondering if when the gentleman from North Carolina presents his amendment he will do so so that Members on this side can go along with him. Will he provide for a commission composed of 1 member to be recommended by the Federal Trade Commission, 1 member recommended by the Treasury Department, 1 recommended by the Federal Reserve Board, 1 by the Department of Commerce, because of these great regulations of industry under rule and not under law, and the other by the New York Stock Exchange, because of the intricacies of the manipulation of the stock exchange? There may also be one man representing the public.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The gentleman evidently does not want the President to name anyone.

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, the President will name all of them. Each department will make the recommendation to the President.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I again tell the gentleman that I am not going to offer any amendment of that kind. I am going to offer an amendment that the President appoint three men by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I do not intend to attempt to tie the hands of the President as to whom he shall name at any time or upon whose recommendation he shall name him. The gentleman knows full well that the President of the United States can be trusted to name the proper man at any time on any commission.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the President of the United States had 25 heads and 25 bodies I would trust him any place, but I have no confidence in the men surrounding the President. They are the ones who have thrown this great fear into the populace of the United States.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Oh, the gentleman is just talking for the RECORD.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am not talking for the RECORD; I am talking to the House.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The gentleman does not mean that at all.

Mr. BRITTEN. There are whisperings in the gentleman's cloakroom and in mine, and there are whisperings all over the United States about the radical element surrounding the President of the United States. Everyone has confidence in the President, but mostly everyone has no confidence in the men surrounding him, and that is the reason I make this suggestion.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Oh, I spend a great deal of my time in the cloakroom, and I have not heard any whisperings like that over here. I cannot tell what the gentleman might do when he gets in his own cloakroom, but I am quite sure that he never listens. I guarantee that.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I was about to reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, but I yield to the gentleman from Ohio for a question, but not a speech.

Mr. TRUAX. This will be a question. The gentleman says there is lack of confidence everywhere. Does he find that the people who show the lack of confidence are returning to a confidence in the administration that preceded this one?

Mr. BRITTEN. On the contrary, I find they are going downhill so fast away from this administration that you gentlemen are seriously concerned about it.

Mr. TRUAX. I say that we are not radical enough.

Mr. PETTENGILL. How does the gentleman explain the registration in the gentleman's own State about 3 weeks ago?

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman allow me to answer the gentleman, please? Then I shall yield. The fact of the matter is that the distinguished leaders on the Democratic side of the aisle are every day admitting they are going to lose 60 seats in the next House, and I maintain that they will lose 106, not 60. That is how fast the people of the country are running away from the present administration.

Mr. BULWINKLE. And the gentleman's imagination is running away with him this afternoon.

Mr. BRITTEN. I shall try to hold my imagination down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I think the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] is correct. I believe, if these appointments to a super agency or commission are to be made, that they should be made directly by the President of the United States. I am sure that he is able and competent to name men well qualified to handle the stock exchange regulations as provided in this bill. The responsibility for this legislation rests with the President and he should have more interest in its proper administration than any other person. He can unquestionably be relied on to select individuals of ability and with special knowledge of market operations and of the New York Stock Exchange. I believe there are many on this side who will support such an amendment giving the President that power, because the Federal Trade Commission already is overburdened with investigations and regulations of thousands of corporations throughout the United States.

The stock exchange is a technical organization. It is a special organization. It requires men versed in that kind of organization and in that kind of work to efficiently administer a stock-exchange-regulation bill.

Some of the older Members of the House will remember 12 or 14 years ago when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had control of drafting veterans' relief legislation in this House. There is no more competent committee in the House than the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce today, nor has there been in the last 14 years since I have been a Member of the House, but it could not write veterans' relief legislation in view of all their other legislative duties. It was overburdened with its own work having to do with railroads, corporations, and interstate and foreign commerce. The committee did not have the time to give to holding hearings and framing veterans' relief legislation. The first thing I did, I think, when I came to Congress was to try to get out a little bill from that committee to increase the pay and compensation for an attendant of a blind soldier from $20 to $40 per month. It must be self-evident that you could not hire anybody as an attendant to a blind veteran for $20, yet it took over a year to get action from that committee.

It took a personal controversy between the then chairman of the committee, Mr. Winslow, a very distinguished and good friend of mine, and myself, over this bill, with the result that it became perfectly evident to every Member of the House, Democrat and Republican, that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce could not give proper and adequate time to writing veterans' relief legislation. The result was that both Democrats and Republicans combined in organizing a new and separate committee. The same principle is involved today. The Federal Trade Commission is like the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, it is burdened with its work and we should set up a separate committee composed of experts chosen and appointed by the President of the United States.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. COX. Due to the close relationship that exists between the pending legislation and the Securities Act, does not the gentleman think that both laws should be administered by the same agency, and does the gentleman not also think that because of the experience which the Federal Trade Commission has had in the administration of the Securities Act and because of the organization it has already built up, if the administration of the pending law should be given to the Commission it could more quickly begin to function effectively, than would be the case in the setting up of a new commission?

Mr. FISH. My answer to the distinguished gentleman, who has presented a very logical case, is this: In the first place, the Federal Trade Commission has utterly failed in the administration of the Securities Act. That act has done more to hamper legitimate and honest business in the United States than anything else and to retard recovery.

Mr. COX. But is not that the unsupported statement of the gentleman?

Mr. FISH. No. No. The Federal Trade Commission has certain powers provided by the Congress of the United States to change the regulations under the Securities Act, and it has failed to do so. It has failed because it has not had time to properly consider the unworkable provisions of the Securities Act, as it has so many other matters to attend to. If I had my way we would liberalize the Securities Act before Congress adjourned and turn it over to a brandnew commission and put both the regulation of the stock exchange and the control of securities under this new agency, to be established by Congress and whose members will be appointed by the President.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Would the gentleman have any objection to enlarging the Federal Trade Commission by three members?

Mr. FISH. Now, that is what it is proposed to do. That is exactly what would happen if we enlarged the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House. You would not get any better results. The committee has to meet together. It has to consider other legislation, and it would not accomplish what you are trying to do. I know the Democratic majority can do what it wants to do, because you have the votes. I know in the Senate a special agency or a special commission is proposed, but if the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE], a member of the House committee, presents his amendment for a separate agency, I hope there will be plenty of time to discuss it on its merits, and I hope Members will vote on it on its merits, regardless of any kind of partisanship, because there should be no partisanship in it.

I even go further than my distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] about the original bill. The gentleman called it a monstrosity. I call it an abomination of desolation, written by the junior members of the "brain trust." It was nothing but a brain storm of a few young radical lawyers including Mr. Ben Cohen and Thomas Corcoran, aided and abetted by Prof. James M. Landis, Federal Trade Commissioner, and Prof. Felix Frankfurter, of Harvard. Thank goodness we have got a committee in this House and a very able chairman of that committee that took hold of the original destructive proposals that would have hampered and ruined legitimate business, and wrote a constructive measure in the interest of the public. [Applause.] There is no question but that the purposes of this bill are to protect the investors, to prevent manipulation of stocks and pool operations, and to prevent destructive and excessive speculation with its disastrous consequences, all of which are sound and in the public interest. The question is whether in some particulars the proposed bill has not gone too far in conferring power to regulate corporations that are only remotely connected with the stock exchange and restricting industry unnecessarily.

There is one statement of the gentleman who is the chairman of the committee, reported in the public press, which I think is unfortunate. It probably was not meant that way, but it was carried in the press that he said he would brand any and all amendments offered on the floor as of Wall Street origin.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman will yield, I did not say any such thing.

Mr. FISH. I knew the gentleman did not say it, and I am very glad to hear him say so, because that statement could not have come from the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. I said when the stock-exchange amendments came I was going to so brand them.

Mr. FISH. Oh, that is different. Unfortunately, the gentleman is misquoted in an editorial in the New York Tribune.

Mr. RAYBURN. I have usually been misquoted about this bill.

Mr. FISH. So, then, we can understand that when the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] presents his amendment for a separate agency it will not be designated as originating from Wall Street, and will therefore be considered on its merits, whether it will improve the bill or not?

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman from New York that the first suggestion of a separate commission was made by Mr. Whitney.

Mr. FISH. After all, who knows more about the stock exchange than the president of the stock exchange?

I am inclined to vote for this bill. I believe some kind of regulation is wise, sound, and necessary. This bill is not perfect; no legislation is perfect; neither are you and I perfect.

We hope, however, to have the time and the opportunity to discuss the amendments on their merits and to try to improve the bill in the House, and maybe it will be improved in the Senate and that together we shall work out a sound and workable bill. Is it to be held against Mr. Whitney because he, the president of the stock exchange, made some suggestion? Is his suggestion to be thrown aside as though it were a selfish suggestion? I have known Mr. Whitney for 25 years. I went to college with him; and I know him to be an honorable, honest, and an upright man, and just as good a citizen as any Member of this House.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman know also that the stock exchange under the directorship of Mr. Whitney resisted this movement for regulation to the point where they saw that resistance was useless, and then they tried to bargain for the best terms they could get?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 4 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York will yield, I want to say to the gentleman from Georgia, in the interest of absolute justice, that I hold no brief for Mr. Whitney or anybody on the stock exchange.

Not a single member of any stock exchange anywhere in the United States objected to regulation of the exchanges. That is the first proposition.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman mean to tell the members of this committee that any member of the different exchanges who appeared before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce did not resist the proposal to write into the legislation the provisions contained in this bill?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Not a single gentleman from anywhere in the United States, from San Francisco to Boston, who came before the committee representing stock exchanges objected to regulation.

Mr. COX. They may not have objected to regulation but did they not specifically object to the provisions of this bill as it now stands?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I may say to the gentleman from Georgia in addition to what I have said, that the pending bill was reported only last week and neither Mr. Whitney nor anyone else anywhere in the United States saw the present bill.

Mr. COX. That is, of course, true; and the present bill is different from the original bill, but there is not a single thing in the present bill they have seen; so we do not know what their reaction to it will be.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield further.

Mr. Chairman, I did not rise to defend the New York Stock Exchange. I admit there are evils and abuses practiced on the stock exchange, and it should have remedied those abuses and evils itself. It should have cleaned its own Augean stables years ago. At least, let me say it was not the stock exchange which caused the disastrous inflation and its ruinous consequences, it was the American people themselves who went money mad. The stock exchange is nothing but the machinery by which the people can buy and sell stocks and bonds. The American people, however, back in 1929, went money mad; they wanted to become rich overnight and indulged in a veritable orgy, not only of extravagance and waste but of gambling and speculation. If there are any guilty people in this country, it is the American public led on by the big international bankers; not by the stock exchange, but by the big international bankers with their security affiliates. They are the people who led us on, encouraged and urged us to buy foreign bonds and a lot of worthless securities. They are the people who, after the inflation collapsed, said that the wages of the American laborers must be reduced, that the compensation of the veterans must be sliced, and that the civil-service employees in the city of New York must have their pay cut.

Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Wiggins, if you want to blame anybody by name, are the ones responsible more than anyone else. They kept telling the Congress in 1929 to keep its hands off business and not to interfere with business, that they knew what was best for the public; and we, I am ashamed to say, listened to them, while they continued to mulct the public and even ruin their own depositors and stockholders. The individual members of the stock exchange are simply in business to handle transactions in stocks and bonds listed on the exchange. I do not think it is fair for any Member to attack either Mr. Whitney or any other member of the stock exchange for transacting legitimate business. If we speculate and lose, we must expect to pay the piper and not blame anyone except ourselves.

I believe in proper regulation. I expect to vote for the bill; but at the same time I do not believe it is fair to try and place the responsibility for the depression upon the New York Stock Exchange. It serves a useful and much-needed purpose of providing capital through selling stocks and bonds of industrial corporations in order to furnish the money for the pay rolls to keep the wheels of industry turning. Private enterprise is in more need of credit and floating stock and bond issues than ever before.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion.

Mr. Chairman, it is always amusing to hear the gentleman from New York. He is always ready to apologize for somebody who lives in his State; and he is always ready to jump on the Federal Trade Commission. Never in the history of the world has there been created a commission more worthy than the Federal Trade Commission of the United States. It is the Commission which found that the utilities of this country were putting their poison in the public schools of our country; that the utilities had bought up college professors and put their poison in the colleges, had taken out textbooks which taught the children both sides of the question of public versus private ownership and allowed the child to reach its own conclusions. It is they who bribed the school boards.

They had bribed college professors, and they put this poison in the schools and colleges of our country. The gentleman from New York gets up and denounces the Trade Commission that caught these thieves red-handed doing this to the American school children of our country.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEE of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. Out in my country they always say that it is the hit dog that yelps the loudest. Someone here this afternoon—I am not sure whether it was the gentleman from Missouri or the gentleman from New York—said that this bill was a monstrosity of desolation. It is desolation for the crooks and the robbers down there who have plundered, pillaged, and sacked this country for 12 years.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Surely, and they want to continue to do that. The Cities Service Co. took $1,100,000,000 of the money of this country, the money of the little school teachers, the widows, and orphans. There is not a World War veteran or dependent of a World War veteran in the United States that they did not invade the home of and take his savings away from him. That is not the worst they did. After they had robbed everybody in this country that they could rob, they invaded the pockets of their own employees, had them mortgage their homes, and took their homes. Talk to me about regulating the stock exchange. The gentleman says Mr. Whitney had nothing to do with the matter. The gentleman from North Carolina got very excited about that. I do not say that Mr. Whitney did, but I ask who is paying for the telegrams and letters that every Member of the House has received in opposition to the bill? Who is putting up the money?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Does the gentleman mean to tell me he has received thousands of telegrams?

Mr. LEE of Missouri. I am telling the gentleman I have received hundreds of them.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I want to find out how many such telegrams and letters the gentleman has received.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Permit me to reply to the gentleman from North Carolina first.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentlemen tell me how many he has received?

Mr. LEE of Missouri. I could not tell you, but I can get them over in my office. I will say that I have received 10 times as many as the gentleman from North Carolina has because they did not need to telegraph him. They knew he was all right already. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes; because they knew I would be absolutely fair and just, that is the reason.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. They were afraid that I would not be, because some of my people have been robbed by them.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Name a single person in your district that has been robbed?

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Oh, yes; hundreds of them have been robbed. The gentleman better not run for Congress in my district and make that statement.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Then name one in your district.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. They would not send the gentleman from North Carolina letters or telegrams anyway, as they know you are sympathetic. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I attempted to say a word during the colloquy when the gentleman from Illinois was speaking at the time the question came up about Mr. Cohen's being on the floor.

The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], came over on this side of the aisle at a moment when the ranking Republican member happened to be off the floor before the close of general debate and stated that he was looking for the gentleman from Ohio. He spoke about the advisability of asking Mr. Cohen to come on the floor, and I said that as far as I was concerned I had no objection. I thought, Mr. Chairman, that I should like to make that statement.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] in the course of his remarks this afternoon made the broad statement that every word in the bill now pending before the committee for its consideration was written by some gentleman from Harvard that he named. The gentleman from Michigan is a distinguished minority member of this committee. May I ask him upon his responsibility as a member of that committee, after the long and arduous time that the committee, the subcommittee, and full committee have devoted to the consideration of this bill, whether or not there was any justification for the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN]?

Mr. BRITTEN. If I might answer the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. I am asking the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. I wanted to supplement what I said before with the further statement that for myself I think it would be perfectly proper to have Mr. Cohen assist the chairman of the committee during the consideration of this bill. May I say in answer to the gentleman from Alabama that I have no personal information as to who prepared the first draft. As far as the final draft of the bill is concerned, it is the work of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and not the work of anyone else. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, the objection to Mr. Cohen's being allowed on the floor was because to do so would be a plain violation of the rules. This is not the first time the question as to who is eligible to remain on the floor has come up, and in the previous instance the gentleman was obliged to withdraw. The rule of the House is very plain and says:

> Only clerks of committees when business from their committee is under consideration may be present, and it shall not be in order for the Speaker to entertain a request for the suspension of this rule or to present from the Chair the request of any Member by unanimous consent.

The rule further states in reference to heads of departments that it means members of the President's Cabinet, and specifically says subordinate executive officers are denied the floor.

It is very clear from the reading of this rule it is not the purpose of the House to permit those who are not eligible to the floor to come in here, and personally I think it would be a very poor policy to violate the rule. For that reason I registered my objection. If the rule were once lapsed, there might continually arise controversies as to who should be permitted on the floor.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. I understand on very reliable authority that there was a representative from the Treasury Department here yesterday during the consideration of the tariff amendment. There has never been a tariff bill considered in this House when a gentleman of the Treasury Department was not present, and this gentleman I am speaking of is an employee of the Government.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will refresh his memory, he will find that the last time the Ways and Means Committee presented a tariff bill—at this session, to be exact—an objection was raised and an employee of the Tariff Commission, who did not have the right to be on the floor, was obliged to withdraw. I know nothing about the incident of yesterday. I was not aware of the presence of anyone who was not entitled to the privilege of the floor being here, but certainly the rule is express, and I believe it should be obeyed.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, this rule resolves itself around the definition of the word "clerk." In this instance Mr. Cohen and Mr. Corcoran have been in constant attendance at the committee hearings, both executive and public, and this might qualify both of them as clerks of the committee. It is a fact, I am told by members of the committee, that in all executive sessions Mr. Cohen sat in.

Mr. RAYBURN, Mr. PETTENGILL, and Mr. MILLIGAN rose.

Mr. RAYBURN. What member of the committee told the gentleman that?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from "Chicago" is out of order.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of the privilege of the House with respect to the remarks just made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], and I ask to have the words taken down.

Mr. BRITTEN. There can be no objection to my words, as I see it. I shall be glad to have them taken down.

Mr. McFARLANE demanded the regular order.

Mr. BRITTEN. I am answering the gentleman in regular order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman cannot take the floor when a request is made that his words be taken down. The gentleman has to take his seat and wait the action of the House.

Mr. FISH. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is willing to withdraw his remarks from the RECORD, well and good, but the gentleman made the statement that during the executive sessions of our committee Mr. Cohen "sat there and practically wrote the bill." This is a reflection upon every member of our committee, including the Republican members of the committee.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, if in my remarks there is the slightest suggestion reflecting on the intelligence of this great committee, of course I shall withdraw it, and I ask unanimous consent that my remarks may be revised so as to merely say that he sat in the committee during the executive sessions, which, of course, he did.

Mr. PETTENGILL. That is correct.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is all I care to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, there is no one except the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce who knows how hard we have worked on this measure for the last 8 or 9 weeks. I know the chairman of the committee has devoted his services day and night to this very difficult piece of legislation; and during all the sessions of the committee partisan politics never entered into our deliberations at any time. There was no partisanship in the committee whatever.

This is one of the most important measures this Congress has had to consider, and it is too important a bill to be made a football of partisan politics. During the last hour partisan politics has crept into the discussion of the measure, and I sincerely hope that the Membership of the House will help to expedite the consideration of the bill. We have got to consider it; and whether we approve everything in the bill or not, we ought to conduct its consideration in a fair and deliberate manner. [Applause.]

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, it is a common practice of late, on the part of some of the so-called "leaders" of the House, as well as various heads of departments, when a Member of Congress would use a little common sense and his own judgment in passing upon the merits of legislation submitted to the Congress, as well as passing upon the various serious problems confronting our country wherein he might differ with these gentlemen, to state that such a Member has gone back on the President or that he is trying to defeat the President's program. I want to state frankly that it is my belief that we have one of the greatest Presidents in the White House at this time that this country has ever had—a man whose purpose, out of a gracious heart, is to protect and promote the welfare of the average business as well as the great masses, even at the expense of the rich of this country. I also want to state that I am 100 percent for the President and his program. However, I am not for any administrator or any of those operating under the various heads of the departments who is willing to permit special interests, representatives of large interests, and big businesses to write rules and regulations governing bills passed by Congress, the various programs and codes advocated by the President, and permit these same interests or their representatives to enforce same at the expense of small industries, independent business concerns, labor, and the great masses of the people of this country.

I am quoting herewith from an article in the Memphis Lumberman and Southern Woodworker:

MY REACTIONS TO THE LUMBER CODE AND MINIMUM PRICES

So far the small-mill operator knows that the code and the price lists were written by and for the big mills. The small manufacturer was not consulted; he had no voice or representation, and by this time most of the small operators who have had the temerity to kick about some flagrant unfairness have learned that kicks are futile, and after the second or third kick he will probably be advised that the small operator doesn't know how well off he is.

Let me state further that I have looked up the pine price committee, and they represent firms rated as follows: 9 are rated $1,000,000 or more, 2 are rated $750,000 or more, 3 are rated $200,000 or more, 2 are rated $100,000 or more.

As to the hardwood price committee, I don't know who they are, but I have yet to find a small operator who has had a voice in the framing of any part of the code covering the fair-practice rules or the so-called "cost-protection prices."

Frankly, I believe the code has real possibilities, but I also believe that if the small manufacturer is not given proper consideration at an early date he will be forced to disregard the code entirely and that will result in more confusion than the industry has ever known.—A Small-Mill Operator.

It is very apparent, after reading this article, that I have been speaking the language of these small operators and small business concerns. Two thirds of these small operators did not know that a code was being written or anything about its contents when it was presented to General Johnson in Washington by the representatives of these large industries.

You will note that the price-fixing committee is composed of men of wealth, none of them being in a position to speak the language of my sawmill operators. This has been the trouble with General Johnson's program—he has permitted this same selfish interest to run things. I am not going to follow that kind of leadership under the guise that it is the President's program. I prefer using a little common sense and a little backbone in trying to save the President and the people in whom he is mostly interested.

I am quoting Mr. Donald Comer, president, the Avondale Mills, Birmingham, Ala., on Wages and Wage Differentials, before the conference of the code authorities, Washington, D.C., Tuesday, March 6, 1934:

With the great preponderance of industry in the North and East, I am told—and it is easy to understand—that out of the 2,033 leaders taken from industry to serve on the 210 code authorities, that only 181 are from the 13 Southern States.

The purpose of my talk is to ask the N.R.A. to give patient heed to the requests that come to them from these agricultural sections for code provisions that meet their needs. They are coming, in every case, speaking for minorities. They are speaking not only for the little industry already established but for that larger part which, by right, is yet to come.

This is exactly what I have been complaining about, Representatives of small sawmills and small industries, as well as small business concerns, have not taken part in writing codes, and the sawmill industry of the South has never been properly represented by anyone who could give an account of its problems and speak its language.

General Johnson states that 70 percent of the sawmill lumber industry was represented in writing the sawmill lumber code.

Let us see who they are and where they come from, as well as whom they represent:

NAME, REPRESENTATIVE OF, AND LOCATION

A. C. Tozzer, member code authority, Turner Construction Co., New York City.

Max Myers, member code authority, National American Wholesale Lumber Association, Cleveland, Ohio.

A. J. Hager, member code authority, National Retail Lumber Dealers' Association, Lansing, Mich.

This is the same Sheppard who jumped on me for defending the small sawmill operators. He sounded his own praises long and loud as a sort of nursing father to small enterprises. Yet he is the same Sheppard who helped to crucify the Willamette Valley and Westport mills, and helped to rig the oak-flooring market by means of the basing point system for the benefit of the Bruce Lumber Co. and the elimination of the lesser units in the industry.

Now, these are the people who wrote the code. You will note that there is not a man from the South connected with the administration. What I am trying to get over to you is the fact that these people—representatives of large industry and large organizations—are the ones who wrote the code, and, also, are the ones who have charge of the enforcement of same. Under these circumstances, the small sawmill operators, small industries, as well as independent business concerns, are unable to receive the proper sympathetic, helpful consideration.

Last August, about the 15th, before leaving Washington for my home, I called General Johnson over the phone and made the following statement to him:

General, you have a beautiful picture as presented in your program whereby you propose to work out codes governing every line of business, with the hope that you may be able to bring about fair-trade practices, fair prices, and fair wages for those thus engaged in, as well as those employed in, the various industries and various lines of business in this country. However, unless you are going to take into consideration the various types of industries, businesses, and labor problems in the various sections of the country, whereby you will be able to secure a real picture of the situation in the various States and various sections of the country so as to be able to work out a satisfactory solution of the problems of industry, business, and labor, which differ in the various States and sections of the country, it will be impossible to successfully operate the N.R.A. program.

What I wanted to get over to General Johnson then, and to you at this time, is that the problems in the same line of industry and the same line of business differ in the various States or the various sections, and that it will be impossible to work them in the picture on the same basis. Certainly, we have a different labor situation in the South to that of any other section of the country. Our capital structure differs, our banking facilities are limited, we have an agricultural State. Therefore, our business is not steady. It is seasonal. From time to time, according to telegrams and letters addressed to General Johnson, you will find that in season and out of season I have been begging General Johnson to send a representative of his administration (not connected with the lumber industry or the Southern Pine Association, which is composed of large lumber industries and whose duty it is to enforce the provisions of the code) into my State so as to be able to get the real picture of the problems of small sawmill operators, which would include labor problems and the consumer's ability to pay, with the hope that the code may be so modified that these people would be able to operate their various mills and thereby give employment to thousands of needy citizens in the various communities of South Carolina.

I am speaking to you about sawmill operators who usually employ from 5 to 25 employees. Many of these sawmill operators are farmers who operate a sawmill in conjunction with their farms. In other words, they use the same employees who work on the farm in running the mill, perhaps at times when they have not any work or are unable to work on the farm. I run a sawmill on my farm along the lines just suggested. Sawmills thus operated always pay their employees a larger wage than they do on the farm. However, because this labor is not at all efficient when it comes to sawmilling, naturally, these mill operators are unable to pay wages in line with the wages paid by large sawmills where they have machinery and efficient employees.

As previously stated, if the general will come down to South Carolina, or send a man down, he will find that this class of labor has free housing, free wood and gardens, and that many of them are full-sized share-croppers. This is not always the case with large sawmill employees and employees in industrial centers. The President recognizes this fact and is now providing money to buy small plots of land, under the subsistence homestead plan, near these large industrial centers in order that these employees can have a milk cow, garden, chickens, and so forth.

During the past few weeks a Mr. Sheppard, who is high up in the council of the mighty and a member of the code authority in connection with General Johnson's Administration, has been trying to convict me on the ground that I have been advising small sawmill operators in my district not to comply with the provisions of the sawmill lumber code. Perhaps Mr. Sheppard has about come to the conclusion that the manner in which they have been trying to force small operators to comply with the code, without having given due consideration to their ability to comply, and that the code authority, as well as the Southern Pine Association, whose duty it is to enforce the code, are about to fall from grace. Naturally, he would be delighted to place the blame on the shoulders of southern Congressmen. I noticed in the press some time ago that Mr. Sheppard gave out a very brief statement, quoting a short excerpt from my letter about which he complains. If he had given to the administration, as well as to the press, the real facts connected with the case prior to the writing of this letter, as well as the full contents of the letter, it certainly would have shown to all parties concerned that, instead of trying to break down the N.R.A. program, as it relates to the sawmill and lumber industry, I have been trying to get over to the administration a little common-sense advice. In the meanwhile, I have been doing more in the way of being helpful than even a great many of those who are connected with and responsible for the success of the program.

On February 13, 1934, I received the following letter from Mr. E. W. Watson, Windsor, Aiken County, S.C.:

WINDSOR, S.C., February 13, 1934.

Hon. H. P. FULMER,
Member of Congress, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. FULMER: As you doubtless remember, I run a small farm, and at times a small sawmill, to make a living.

I work a few hands, possibly five, first on the farm and then at the mill. My work is not such that I can strictly abide by the codes that the Government has burdened us with, especially as to hours and wages.

I have asked for a code membership for the mill, and so far as that goes, I propose to practically stay in line with the demands. But, as stated above, I cannot do this strictly in every detail on account of the mixed duties.

Now there are some big mill operators around my territory who seem to wish me to simply cut my timber and sell to them at any price they put on it, claiming that the code allows them to buy at wholesale, at any price they see fit. And, at the same time, they make a veiled threat that, if I go into the open market and take orders, they will see that I am jerked up for breaking the code; yet they beat us little fellows down and won't allow us to sell, only to them. They are located in Aiken, Augusta, and such large places.

They have one of their bookkeepers or clerks appointed as inspector, who keeps them posted as to our movements, tracts of timber, and everything they can do to intimidate us. Many of us are really quitting and discharging our help; we cannot afford to operate with such a weight suspended over us. I simply quit sawing, and the hands are now loafing and begging over the neighborhood. They are after me to let them work for me, and are perfectly willing to accept good fair wages in order to be self-supporting. They have no complaint to make at all, only begging for work which I can't afford to give them.

Can't I allow them to log and saw by the thousand and pay them all they ask without being interfered with by those big corporations? I do not wish to break any code or break their rules, only wish to give my hands work when not working on the farm. I hate to annoy you, but we need help and advice or we are going to suffer and lose what we have, mill and all.

Do, please, let me have some effective advice.

With best regards, I am sincerely yours.

E. W. WATSON.

On February 16 I replied to Mr. Watson as follows:

FEBRUARY 16, 1934.

MR. E. W. WATSON,
Windsor, S.C.

MY DEAR MR. WATSON: Replying to your letter just received, will state that I have conferred with a representative of the N.R.A. with the hope that we would be able to work out some plan whereby small sawmill operators would be able to operate their mills without much trouble under the code. It appears, however, that we are unable to make much headway. If I were you, I would operate your mill on a common-sense basis, being just as fair to the hands who work for you as you possibly can, in line with the prices which you receive for your lumber.

I understand that a man will go down to South Carolina, representing the lumber code, and, also, a representative of the Federal Trade Commission, for the purpose of trying to get complete information, so as to be helpful in perhaps modifying the code, which would be helpful to small sawmills. Just as soon as I have some report from these parties, I will be glad to communicate with you.

Sincerely yours,

H. P. FULMER, Member of Congress.

P.S. Keep a watch-out for this party.

Mr. Sheppard, in making his charges against me and other Southern Representatives in Congress, did not state that I had been continually calling on General Johnson and conferring with the representatives of the N.R.A., hoping that I would be able to be helpful in working out or modifying the code so that thousands of small mill operators, who are just as patriotic and who are just as anxious to carry out the provisions of the code as any of the large industries, would be able to operate thereunder, as well as to save wage earners and consumers. Mr. Sheppard also failed to state in regard to this letter that it contained a statement that the administration had promised to send a man down to make an investigation for the purpose of getting a real picture of Mr. Watson's situation, as well as that of other small mill operators in South Carolina, all of which would indicate that I was striving to be helpful to the administration and, in the meantime, keep Mr. Watson and his employees out of the bread line.

You will note, after writing my letter to Mr. Watson, wherein I stated that I had been promised that a man would be sent down, I put a postscript on the letter telling him (Mr. Watson) to look out for this party. Mr. Sheppard would have the other members of the code authority, as well as General Johnson, and the public, believe that I was trying to tip Mr. Watson off so that he could cover up. If this was true, why would I have written Mr. Watson in the same letter as follows:

I understand that a man will go down to South Carolina representing the lumber code and also a representative of the Federal Trade Commission, for the purpose of trying to get complete information so as to be helpful in perhaps modifying the code, which would be helpful to small sawmills. Just as soon as I have some report from these parties, I will be glad to communicate with you.

P.S. Keep a watch-out for this party.

My letter was addressed to Mr. Watson on February 16. On March 6 I received the following letter from Mr. Bravo, compliance department:

LUMBER CODE AUTHORITY,
Washington, D. C., March 6, 1934.

Hon. HAMPTON P. FULMER,
New House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We herewith confirm telephone conversation of March 5, relative to a complaint against the code by E. W. Watson, Windsor, S.C.

At our request, the Southern Pine Association has had their Mr. Sykes call upon Mr. Watson and explain to him in detail the purpose and provisions of the code. They now advise that Mr. Watson will comply with the code in the future.

The Southern Pine Association is having their representative call on every little sawmill operator in their division as rapidly as possible, with the view of explaining the purpose and provisions of the code to them. In almost every case, the mill men appreciate this courtesy and after a visit of the Southern Pine Association representative, they see the code in an entirely different light.

The Southern Pine Association decided to adopt this plan after same had been suggested by yourself and other Members of Congress, and the plan apparently is working out very satisfactorily.

Thanking you for your courtesy and assistance in this matter, we are

Very truly yours,

LUMBER CODE AUTHORITY,
H. L. BRAVO,
Compliance Department.

It appears from this letter that I was not tipping Mr. Watson off so that he could cover up, as stated by Mr. Sheppard. From the time of my telephone conversation with General Johnson on August 15, 1933, to the time I wrote to Mr. Watson, the record will show that I was trying to serve my constituents in having someone go down and give them information as well as get real facts, first hand, at the sawmill.

In the last paragraph of Mr. Bravo's letter he states:

The Southern Pine Association decided to adopt this plan after same had been suggested by yourself and other Members of Congress, and the plan apparently is working out very satisfactorily.

It appears that at last I have gotten results. Practically every letter I received from my sawmill people requested information. They wanted to cooperate but they had been receiving threatening letters about taking them to court. If General Johnson had taken my common-sense advice several months ago, perhaps thousands of these little mills which had to close would have been able to continue their operations.

Mr. Bravo states that now Mr. Watson will comply with the code. If this is possible, what harm did I do to Mr. Sheppard, if writing Mr. Watson as I did kept him and his hands going until he could get what he was asking for from Washington? I am still 100 percent behind my position in this matter and my letters to my sawmill operators. If Mr. Bravo is right about straightening out Mr. Watson, Mr. Sheppard owes me an opology. However, I am not expecting any. If he were the right type and the right man for the position he holds, he never would have made the statements he did about me. I am working overtime to save my people and the President from just such men as Mr. Sheppard.

It has not been the purpose of these small sawmill operators to evade the requirements of the code. On the contrary, they have been continually seeking information in order that they might meet the requirements. Many of them have been distressed over the fact that compliance meant cessation of their mill operations—unemployment for their employees, and, in many instances, for themselves.

The following excerpts from letters written to me by these small operators are a few of the many which I have received. How truly they depict the distress of these people; their desire to fall in line with the President's program; and their attitude toward the sawmill lumber code.

ELIMINATION OF SMALL MILLS

We fully agree with all you have said in your telegram to General Johnson. Since August 22 we have lived up to the code as to hours and wages, which are the main features, and the other parts so far as we could, but it has been a losing proposition to us, and we must get relief in some form, otherwise we will be forced out of business. All we have is in the business, and to close down would mean ruination, and to continue fully under the code will also mean ruination. It has looked to the writer all along like the Southern Pine Association would be glad to eliminate the small millman from the lumber business. The purchasing agent for one of the largest buyers of yellow pine in this section told the writer recently that, in conversation with a Southern Pine Association man, the statement was made by the association man that the small millmen have never cooperated with the association nor borne their share of the expense, and that the only way to handle him was to eliminate him from the business.

RUINATION IN EITHER EVENT

All we have is in the business and if we have to close down it would mean ruination. And to continue fully under the code will also mean ruination.

I HAVE TO WORK TO FEED MY FAMILY

I am being threatened with the Southern Pine Association for operating without paying 24 cents per hour. My lumber sales will not pay my stumpage and other necessary expenses at the above-mentioned price. Also, this association states that I will have to pay back time and I have no money to pay with. I have to work to feed my family.

I AM UNABLE TO PAY THE PRICE

I have been threatened by the Southern Pine Association from time to time to the extent that I have had to discharge all of my hands and run the mill as best I can by myself, not being allowed to hire anyone unless paying 24 cents per hour and work 8 hours per day. The market I have to sell my lumber on is the farming class of people, so I am not able to pay the price set by the Southern Pine Association.

EXCESSIVE BILLS

It is absurd for the Southern Pine Association, which is an association of the large lumber mills, to be allowed to enforce a code on small lumbermen.

I have been sent what I consider excessive bills for code administration. I have a bill from our regional head for expense, and also one much larger from the Common Brick Manufacturing Association for administration expense. It looks like they not only dictate us to bankruptcy, but ask us to pay for same. I just have not the money to pay these bills. I have been behind on just bills for things that we owe for and am still behind.

NO EXTRA CAPITAL. HOW CAN WE COMPLY?

We operate our sawmill on a very small basis. We use from four to eight hands and pay them from the proceeds of our lumber. We depend on the local market for our sales. We do not see how we can comply with the Southern Pine Association. We do not have any extra capital.

AM I VIOLATING THE CODE?

The code authority claim I have to get the same price for my lumber at the mill as the people in the city of Charleston and add 15 cents per mile for hauling. This has hurt my business more than anything the code authority has done, for the people will not buy lumber from me when they have to pay the delivery charges on same.

I would appreciate it very much if you would advise me if I am violating the code law by working code hours and paying my labor code prices, and selling my lumber for a fair price. I am sure this will be using common sense.

WE GET A MUCH LOWER PRICE

We are operating a small sawmill and find the code of no benefit to us. There are many small orders which we could get if allowed to sell direct from the mill. But we are forced to sell to (or through) our local dealer. He gets code prices. We get a much lower price. In other words, the dealer may buy at whatever price he can get us to sell for—and, if we must sell to him, what can the mill operator do?

WE WANT TO MAKE AN HONEST LIVING

I am one of eight brothers, all of us engaged in individual business on a small scale, some of it small sawmill business, all trying to give as near a square deal as possible and make for ourselves an honest living; you evidently know what we are up against.

WE DO NOT HAVE TO BE THREATENED TO OBEY THE LAW

We are practically closed down. Our men are on starvation. And, our business has dropped off 70 percent in the last 60 days. The code hours, wages per hour, and price fixing are putting us out of business and we and many others will have to close up shop and quit a business we have been in and made a living at for many, many years. We are required to pay a minimum wage of 24 cents per hour, not work any man over 40 hours per week, and a minimum price is fixed on lumber which our farmers cannot pay at 8-cent and 10-cent cotton and tobacco. Our company does not have to be threatened in order to obey laws. As far as it is humanly possible, we want to do so. It is our duty. But, it is hard to live up to something which is putting your men out of work and financially ruining your business. We thank you collectively and individually for your stand and hope that you will be successful in getting them to see the conditions that thousands of small millmen are in and the hardships and suffering of their employees.

IT IS SIMPLY IMPOSSIBLE

It is simply impossible and out of all reason to expect the small sawmills to comply with some of the requirements of the code as applied to large sawmills.

FARMERS CANNOT PAY CODE PRICES

My lumber, which is only an unfinished product, is sold to the average farmer, and is used for general repair work and necessary farm buildings. Farmers, as you know, cannot pay code prices for lumber.

It is impossible for me to sell lumber under such conditions; then I shall be forced to shut down, which act will mean that 15 men who have been earning a living independent of Government aid and food through these years of depression will be added to the army of the unemployed.

MR. ROOSEVELT A GREAT MAN

We think Mr. Roosevelt is one of the greatest men the country has ever produced, and do not think that if he were familiar with the conditions of the small mill owners that he would permit through the operation of the N.R.A., a group in any industry that did not furnish more than one fourth of the employment to individuals, to crush the less fortunate group who furnish three fourths of the labor in the entire industry.

TWENTY-THREE MEN OUT OF WORK

I am writing you in regard to small sawmill operation.

I bought a mill at Norway on January 1, and Mr. Fraser and I have run it together since then, until the 2d of March, when we decided that it was impossible to pay the N.R.A. wages and hours and split even. I regretted it very much, as we had to lay off 23 men that had been working regularly.

MY ONLY MEANS OF SUPPORT

I have a small community mill. I buy no logs, ship no lumber, and only run when people bring logs for me to cut for them at so much per thousand or on shares. And I am sure that I do not average 1,000 feet per week during the year. It is my only means of support, and when I run the mill I give work to four or five men, which is some help to them and a convenience for the community to have in our midst. I appeal to you for a suitable code for my class of small lumber mills.

GIVE ME LIBERTY OR GIVE ME DEATH

I pray you to use your influence and power as Congressman to give free-born American citizens back their freedom.

Why, they are coming to my sawmill, telling me what I can do and what I can't do with my own timber and what I must pay my labor, no matter how trifling it may be, and what I must sell my lumber for, which is so high that persons in need of lumber cannot buy.

I am quoting from a letter addressed to a number of sawmill operators:

I have succeeded in having a representative of General Johnson visit my district next week for the purpose of working out satisfactory arrangements with sawmill operators with the hope that they can get together on the sawmill lumber code on a satisfactory basis.

A few excerpts from various letters received in reply to the above:

SEEKING INFORMATION

The writer is grateful for your letter and would be glad indeed to have a chance to talk with the representative from General Johnson's office. Should this gentleman not find it convenient to come here, I would be glad to meet him in Orangeburg or at any other place that would be convenient for him. I would prefer, however, to talk with him here.

EXPECTING INFORMATION

I have been expecting a representative of the N.R.A. to call on me, as you gave me notice, but as yet I haven't seen or heard of him.

WE GREATLY APPRECIATE YOUR EFFORTS

We would be glad to discuss our problems with the gentleman. We want you to know we greatly appreciate your efforts on behalf of the lumber manufacturers.

GETTING THE REAL PICTURE

A representative from the Federal Trade Commission called on the writer at his mill this week. We explained to him the difficulties we are having; small tracts of timber, mostly of low quality, rather high-priced stumpage; the amount we were able to cut per day; the prices we are getting for the class of lumber we manufacture; the limited amount of orders; the number of men we work; and the amount of the pay roll.

SMALL OPERATORS APPRECIATIVE

We had a visit from Mr. J. E. Sheehy, of the Federal Trade Commission.

The writer greatly appreciates your efforts in behalf of the lumbermen.

From the following excerpts it is very apparent that my sawmill constituents appreciate my efforts in their behalf:

We are counting on you to fight our battle while the N.R.A. is on trial.

We certainly think you are dead right in your position for them to comply with the code so far as they possibly can.

Hoping that you may live for many more years to fight the battle for the man who needs help, the poor man.

Mr. FULMER, I served my county (Chesterfield) with Hon. J. C. Rivers in the house of representatives at Columbia, 1919 and 1920, and remember you and am glad to know that you were further honored by your people. Keep hammering at Mr. Johnson, for your cause is armed with truth and justice.

We thank you collectively and individually for your stand and hope that you will be successful in getting them to see the condition thousands of small mill men are in and the hardships and suffering of their employees.

Our daily paper mentioned the fact that you had been in touch with small sawmills in South Carolina and had written them to use common sense in the interpretation of the lumber code.

We congratulate you on your stand, and if more of our Representatives in Washington would take an interest in the oppression now being brought upon small sawmills in the South under the lumber code, the N.R.A. would become more popular and we believe that the general public at large would be greatly benefited.

The lumber code was written by large manufacturers, the administration of the code in various sections is under the control of the same group, and these same men form the lumber code authority.

The small sawmills are not organized; they do not have the time nor the money to be represented, and lack of representation in the formation and administration of the code naturally resulted in monopolistic control of these codes with price fixation that does not protect the small mill.

It is conceded that the cost of manufacturing lumber by the larger mills averages from $8 to $10 per thousand feet higher than similar cost of producing lumber by small mills.

We commend the position that you have taken and believe that there are many more Representatives in Congress who would take the same position if they only had first-hand information on this subject. We know that you are busy, but you come from a lumber-producing State; in fact, most of the mills in South Carolina are small sawmill operators who are being seriously oppressed by the present provisions of the lumber code.

SUMTER, S.C., March 15, 1934.

FULMER'S STAND O.K.

EDITOR THE HERALD,
Sumter, S.C.

DEAR SIR: Congressman FULMER was right when he told those small plants and mills to use common-sense methods in operating their business. He knew then, as most of us know now, that the N.R.A., as fine as it is, would work undue hardship on numerous small business establishments. He also knew that something would have to be worked out to give relief to them. Meanwhile he wanted to help them stay in business until that could be done. Can anyone conceive of a more practical thing to do under such circumstances than to use common-sense methods? If our Representatives in Congress will use common-sense methods, let's shout their praises from the housetops, not criticize them.

Yours very truly,

J. S. RIDER.

When I appeared before Sheppard and his group I found them on the tenth floor of the Raleigh Hotel trying to tell sawmill operators in my district how to run their mills, and jumping on Congressmen, especially those who were trying to save their constituents, as well as the President, who has intrusted the carrying out of his recovery program to men like Sheppard. In speaking to this group I was told that if Congress would give them more money, it would be possible to send men into the field to do the things that I had been requesting. I said, "If you will stop holding expensive group meetings here in Washington hotels, it would appear to me that you would not need any more money." I also stated that if with all the money which Congress had appropriated they were unable to properly and successfully carry on, the money must be going into a rat hole somewhere. The next morning I read in the Brooklyn Daily Eagle the following:

C.W.A. PAYS $70 PER RAT IN DRIVE—BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE REPORTS ERADICATION CAMPAIGN DROPPED AS TOO COSTLY

BROOKLYN, N.Y., March 8.—The C.W.A. campaign to rid the city of rats has been dropped, the Brooklyn Daily Eagle says, because it was found to be costing $70 a rat.

The campaign began a month ago when 261 C.W.A. workers were equipped with traps and bait and sent out on what was called "the ectoparasitic rodent survey." Waiting to record the results of their work was a battery of timekeepers, typists, and technicians, the Eagle says.

The purpose was to supply rats for experiments being conducted by the United States Public Health Service as well as to eliminate the rodents from tenements, wharves, and dumps.

Hopes of catching 200 rats a day went aglimmering when the trappers returned with only 60 or 70 a day, and with $218,000 appropriated for the first 45 days it was decided the project was too costly.

Why is it that these small sawmill operators cannot comply with the code as written by the representatives of these large sawmill and lumber organizations? In my own district, of eight counties of the States, I have, perhaps, as many as three to five hundred of these little mills in the various communities in these counties. All of these small mills are being operated on an independent unit basis.

They have never been able to organize, and, like farmers, never will be able to do so. They have not any working capital, but from week to week they run their mills, selling the output—all rough lumber—for the most part locally to farmers and small-town merchants for the purpose of repairing and building farm and small town buildings. They have no way on the face of the earth to fix a price for their lumber. The prices are fixed in the locality in which the mill operates, largely according to the ability of the purchaser to pay. They pay the operating expenses of their mill and their labor weekly from the lumber that they usually cut and deliver during the week. In other words, when it comes to capital, they are in the same position as the average small, independent industry, and the average small business concern, which we have all over the South, as well as in every other section of the country—they do not have it and no place has been provided from which they can secure same.

Much has been said by General Johnson about providing funds to help small concerns continue to operate under the N.R.A., but so far nothing has been done along this line. Provision has been made for railroads, insurance companies, banks, and so forth. Large industries, large business concerns, chain stores, and large corporations are able to secure funds, as a rule. This is not so with the people for whom I am fighting. Because of this situation many of them are being forced to the wall.

The operation of these mills during the past few years has been providing bread and meat for thousands of needy employees, who have, so far as my information goes, been paid in line with the prices that these sawmill operators are able to secure for their lumber. As far as I am concerned, cheap wages has been one of the greatest curses of the South. But, even so, it is better in this instance to have these small mill operators, as well as all small lines of industry and independent business, keep going and paying just as fair wages as possible in line with their ability to pay, rather than to close them up. The closing of these concerns would be in the interest of the large industries, large business concerns, and would place thousands of employees in bread lines and on the mercy of the Government.

Small sawmill operators and small lumber dealers subscribe to the policy of adding a reasonable profit to the expense of running their business. In the meantime, as previously stated, they sell rough lumber and their customers are largely farmers and small business concerns who are not able to comply with the fixed minimum price under the code which includes profits from 30 to 70 percent. Lumber which has been selling on a small-profit basis has been advanced largely to protect large operators where overhead expenses call for a much higher price.

Listen to these fixed minimum prices:

B & B KILN DRIED ROUGH FINISH

Approximately a year ago the retail prices upon a 30 percent profit on cost and fixed prices under the code today are as follows:

	Per 1,000 feet
No. 1 common flooring was	$25.00
Under the code	46.62
No. 1 common ceiling was	22.50
Under the code	38.00
Air-dried roofers was	18.00
Under the code	29.50
Rough lumber, small mills, was	10.00
Under the code	20.00

[From the News and Courier, Charleston, S.C., Mar. 17, 1934]

SHIPLOAD OF FIR TIMBER COMES IN—"WILZIPPO" UNLOADING 750,000 FEET OF LUMBER FROM PACIFIC COAST

A cargo of 750,000 feet of Pacific fir timber is being discharged in Charleston from the steamship Wilzippo. Of the cargo, approximately 500,000 feet is being discharged at the Century Wood Preserving Co.'s plant for treatment there and the remainder is consigned to the Southern Railway Co.

This is the first large cargo of Pacific fir to be discharged here, and it is believed that it will be the beginning of a regular movement. It was loaded in Port Ludlow, Wash., and is to be used in the construction of wharves and bridges.

These large Pacific coast manufacturers have been able to write into the code points for basing their prices thereon, as well as fixing a price, for instance, on fir lumber, that will enable them to undersell manufacturers of pine lumber.

J. W. JACKSON,
LOGS, LUMBER, MEAL, AND GRITS,
Summerville, S.C., April 2, 1934.

Congressman H. P. FULMER,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I noticed your remarks in the State last week relative to the small sawmill men of the South, and wish to thank you very much for the stand you have taken on this matter. If some more of our Congressmen and Senators would take a hand they could do us a world of good.

I have seen quite a lot of Douglas fir coming into Charleston from the west coast. I also saw a letter from one of the biggest buyers in this section, and they made the statement that they could buy Douglas fir from $8 to $12 per thousand less, delivered here, than the code prices on pine. It, therefore, stands to reason that if there isn't some step taken to protect us our future is doomed. Thanking you again, I am,

Yours very truly,

J. W. JACKSON.

Just stop and think for a moment about a lumber code that will permit lumber dealers in the State of Washington to deliver at Charleston on a cheaper basis than sawmill operators in South Carolina or lumber dealers located in Charleston.

It appears that the consumer should also be taken into consideration under the National Recovery program. As fast as we do something for farmers in order to secure better prices for their produce, the N.R.A. comes along with additional advances in the prices of the things which farmers have to buy. Yet, farmers were promised parity prices.

In other words, prices for their products on a par with prices for goods which they must purchase.

I want to digress here long enough to make this statement: I am confident that, if the administration would restore the proper prices for farm products, it would not be necessary to take charge of every line of business, hoping to so manage or control same that normal prosperity will be brought back. It is not the average business which needs controlling by the Government. It is that class—about 5 percent of the total population—which controls the finances of the country—those who have robbed the average American citizen in every walk of life by speculation, monopolistic price fixing, defeating the Government of just payment of taxes, and selling millions and millions of worthless stocks and bonds. I am for controlling these birds, thereby giving the average citizen an opportunity to make an honest living.

Let us return to the sawmills. The lumber dealers in the large forest areas and cities, where financial facilities are ample and where they have a place to go to replenish their working capital, being organized and having a large sales force, may, no doubt, be able to sell their lumber at the drastic price proposed. However, lumber cannot be sold in rural communities of farmers and small tradespeople, where the profit demanded is from 50 to 75 percent.

Listen to this. I am quoting from a letter received on March 21:

> Your small sawmill operators, under the code, are in this almost unbearable situation, due only to the fact that the men who composed Lumber Code Authority and had set forth the rules and regulations under which the lumber industry must operate, had reserved unto themselves and other large manufacturers of lumber the right to buy the product of the small producer without regard to the so-called "cost-production prices" which they also had put into effect. Through this reservation, the larger manufacturers, or concentration yards, were permitted to go to your constituents, the small producers, and take their lumber at any price; yet your constituents were asked to pay identically the same wage scale as the big manufacturer.
> That, sir, is the reason your constituents, according to your statement, were receiving only an average of $10 to $11 per thousand board-feet, while the big operator, who took this material, was enabled to sell the same material, without further remanufacture, at from $22 to $23.

I want to quote from a telegram addressed to General Johnson on October 28, while I was in my district, where I was able to observe the situation:

ORANGEBURG, S.C., October 28, 1933.

Gen. HUGH S. JOHNSON,
N.R.A., Washington, D.C.

Numerous small lumber mills, operating 6 to 25 employees in South Carolina, selling their output altogether locally, cannot comply with the code operated under by large manufacturers of lumber. They have no extra capital—in many instances paying their running expenses from their weekly receipts from sales of lumber. A representative of the Southern Pine Association, a combination composed of large manufacturers, is understood to be operating as an agent of the Government, and is now checking these plants in South Carolina, threatening court proceedings. I am informed that this association is going after, largely, small plants who are unable to pay membership dues in this association. I find these mills unable to fix prices on what they sell and depending on local market prices, which will not permit them to fully comply. However, I find them patriotically running their mills on a common-sense basis with fair wages in line with prices received for lumber. I also find to do otherwise they would have to close down, which seems to be what the Southern Pine Association would be delighted to have them do, and which would put hundreds of employees out of work. I have advised sawmill owners in my district, above referred to, to continue as best they can, awaiting a representative from your organization to come down to make an investigation so as to get a real picture of the situation so that agreements may be worked out that they can comply with and that would meet the situation. I earnestly request a prompt investigation. Please inform me if the representative of the Southern Pine Association is operating as an employee of your administration; if not, by whose authority is it permitted to threaten mill owners with court proceedings?

H. P. FULMER,
Member of Congress.

Official business.

General Johnson did not send a man down. He was too busy leaving everything with the code authority and the Southern Pine Association. The Southern Pine Association had an idea that they could run these small mills or close them up by writing, threatening them with Federal court proceedings.

Although I stated to General Johnson in my telegram, "I have advised sawmill owners in my district to continue as best they can, awaiting a representative from your organization to come down so as to get a real picture of the situation", and although I requested a prompt investigation, he did not send anyone down or even mention the matter. Here is the answer which I received:

NATIONAL RECOVERY ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D.C., November 1, 1933.

Hon. H. P. FULMER,
Orangeburg, S.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I beg to acknowledge your night letter concerning the difficulties being experienced by small lumber mills in the southern-pine division, under the code for the lumber and timber products industries, in supporting the minimum wage established for that division. I have requested that the economic effects of that minimum on the industry be studied by the lumber-code authority for the purpose of making recommendations to me in order that I may determine whether experience under the code indicates the need of further recommendations to the President.

I am informed that the Southern Pine Association has been designated by the lumber code authority as its administrative agency for the southern-pine division under the code. You will recognize that, in an undertaking in industrial self-government under the National Industrial Recovery Act, duly appointed representatives of an agency under a code authority are necessary to the effective operation of a code. If such representatives, in some cases, have lacked all the tact that could be desired, I am sure you will understand that, in the case of the lumber industry, the number of operating units, in the South particularly, present a problem designed to tax the ability of any administrative organization.

May I explain that approval of a basic code of fair competition for an industry, under the National Industrial Recovery Act, establishes it as the law for the industry concerned, under which it must govern itself? In order to accomplish the primary purposes set forth in the act, the maximum hour and minimum wage provisions of a basic code cannot be fatal economic injustice to competing groups. For this reason the mills referred to in your region must observe the hour and wage provisions of the code until action, approved by the President, has been taken. In no other way could cooperation between management and labor be maintained and ultimate stability of industrial and employment conditions be achieved.

Very truly yours,

HUGH S. JOHNSON, Administrator.

I am going to put on the witness stand at this time a small sawmill operator, also a county commissioner. This party resides in Georgia, but he speaks the language of my people.

GRAYMONT, GA., March 14, 1934.

Mr. H. P. FULMER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Although I am not a citizen of your congressional district, nor of your State, I have been reading with a great deal of interest of your speeches and actions in regard to the dictatorial attempts of the Southern Pine Association, under the N.R.A. lumbermen's code, to freeze out and choke out all the little "coffee-pot" sawmills by attempting to impose on them the minute exactions of the code as would apply as to the larger mill units.

For instance, we have just a small no. 2 Lombard sawmill set up near our gin plant, with a 200-foot steam line to a 25-horse engine, yet I was told yesterday that if I operated 1 day with farm labor from our various farms, cutting our own logs, gotten out at spare wet times, with surplus farm labor, that I would be compelled to pay this ordinary pick-up labor 24 cents an hour for only 8 hours. This man further told me that I could not cut our own logs and our own cypress blocks to get lumber and shingles with which to patch up a bunch of rotten-down farm buildings unless I paid all this labor at code prices. Furthermore, that if I sold one piece I would be forced to sell it at the code prices.

For instance, we owe a big bunch of back taxes, and the county, of which I am a county commissioner, has agreed to take lumber for bridges on these back taxes at $20 a thousand, yet this association says that if I do this and sell it for less than the code price of $38, less 10 percent, that I would be liable to the Federal court for breaking the code.

Would you be good enough to give me all the information you have in regard to the working of this code as applies to us small, broke, rag-tail sawmill men who saw only when we can get enough of our surplus farm labor and poor farm mules to get out a few logs for a few days and then go and saw a few days? Is there anything fair about a plan to force us to come under the code just the same as a big sawmill man who has a large, well-trained organization to push his business?

I assure you that I will appreciate any information or suggestions that you may be able to give me.

Very truly yours,

V. E. DURDEN,
Member of Board of County Commissioners of Emanuel County.

No group, including "Sawmill Code" Sheppard, who at a later meeting in Memphis, Tenn., continued to censure me, will be able to get the picture as painted by Mr. Durden by holding meetings on the tenth floor at the Raleigh Hotel in Washington and attending meetings at Memphis, Tenn.

You will also note Mr. Durden, like my people, is seeking information. The Southern Pine Association, instead of doing what I requested—give them information—sends them a letter, threatening to send them to Federal court. Listen to this:

LEXINGTON, S.C.

The writer is in receipt of a registered "notice of violation" dated October 14, from the Southern Pine Association, signed by its secretary-manager, in which it is stated that the association "has received information that I have violated the code of fair competition in the following premises: Minimum wage rate, maximum hours of labor."

The "notice" further states that "unless an immediate explanation of the foregoing charges is received by the Southern Pine Association, this matter will be handled through the district courts of the United States * * *."

I am 49 years of age, married, with a wife and 10 children to support. I was born and reared on the farm, and at an early age, in addition to farming, engaged with my brothers in sawmill operations. Later, in good times, with my brothers we were the Lexington Lumber Co., with a rather nice plant and equipment, located at Cayce, S.C. At that time we were members of the Southern Pine Association, and as such members our company paid them hundreds of dollars in fees. In 1926, during the period which was a forerunner of the depression, the Lexington Lumber Co. was put into the hands of the receivers by the banks, and as a result I lost practically everything I had accumulated. In an effort personally to recover, I continued by farming operations, on a much curtailed scale, and, with a small tractor mill, cut such timber always in small quantities as I could obtain, selling the entire output locally to the Columbia Lumber Co. and other local yards. I have managed to make a living for my family, but no profit whatever. In the operation of my three-horse farm, together with such milling operations as I could do, I have employed from five to eight men almost continuously, the farming operations being always the major activity. This labor, entirely colored, was with me in good times, and continued with me when the crash came. To such reasonable extent as conditions, prices, and times would permit, I have always endeavored to help them live. When hard times first struck this section I paid them, and they accepted gladly, a wage of 50 cents per day, and at that time could get any amount of labor of that class at that figure, but naturally I took care of those who were with me first. Whenever there came an advance in price of lumber I was able to manufacture, I gave my labor a corresponding increase in wage. When I was paying them 50 cents per day, lumber of the type I was cutting was selling from $6.50 to $8 per thousand; and when it advanced from $8 to $12 per thousand, I advanced the wage of my employees to 75 cents per day. We worked, whether the farm or at the mill, the average time for the farm day.

I want to know authoritatively if my small activities, under the circumstances and conditions that I have stated, are considered a breach of the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act. Of course, pending a ruling in this regard I have entirely suspended all sawmilling operations.

E. J. CORLEY.

You will note that Mr. Corley, on account of being threatened with Federal court, closed down his mill and his hands had to apply to the C.W.A. Mr. Corley states, "I want information." But he did not get it. Sheppard was too busy holding meetings at the Raleigh Hotel in Washington.

ECONOMIC IMPORTANCE OF THE SMALL SAWMILL

Virginia	2,421,851	3	59,554,000	1,164	435,935,000
Total	24,279,986	201	4,417,196,000	7,347	4,708,054,000

The economic value of this unit is worthy of the closest scrutiny and, because of its large place in the lives of the people of the South, demands the most thoughtful consideration of those charged with the responsibility of administering the National Recovery Act. May we consider nine Southern States manufacturing southern pine, as follows: Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia.

It is not generally known that during the year 1930 the production of lumber in these nine States reflected by the records of the Department of Commerce of the United States was in the proportions indicated by the above tabulation.

These data are taken from page 5, table no. 2, Forest Products, Department of Commerce statistics for 1930, the latest available Government information.

Of this total quantity of lumber, 4,417,196,000 feet were manufactured by 201 larger mills, whereas 4,708,054,000 feet were manufactured by 7,347 mills.

Actual experience has taught sawmill operators that the manufacture of 1,000 feet of lumber in the South requires the labor of approximately four men. The calculations just quoted point to the thought that the 201 large mills employed during the last 2 years 58,900 men, giving them approximately one third time during the year. On the other hand, the 7,347 small mills in the same territory, under the same line of reasoning, employed 62,774 men approximately one third time. The last census shows that the States in question were populated by approximately 24,279,986 people. Assuming that each of these sawmill workers had four dependents, the average family, the 7,347 small mills in these States during the year 1930 employed men who supported 313,870 people, whereas the 201 large mills employed men who supported only 294,500 people. It is readily seen that approximately 1.3 percent of the population of these nine States were supported by employees of the small mills discussed, whereas, approximately 1.2 percent of the population was supported by the 201 larger mills to which reference has been made.

Wages paid by small mills is a considerable factor in the well-being of the rural population of the nine States mentioned, all of which are essentially agricultural in their production.

The small mills in the South, large in number at this time, are affording employment to an army of people. Their continued operation is highly desirable on account of the fact that they are giving to a large section of the population a means of earning a livelihood. These small mills are converting timber, which for years has been passed by as of no value, into lumber. They are reducing such timber to cash, returning to farmers, small landowners, and others new money, as new capital, which would otherwise remain on the stump as a frozen asset, or no asset at all. The large sums paid by such mills to labor, to supply dealers, to timber owners, and others from whom they buy, keep alive no small part of the business fabric of the Nation. Factories in other sections of the country are afforded markets for their products in exchange for the moneys produced and distributed by these small mills. It is unthinkable that the Government can permit any scheme, or establishment of methods which would unfairly hamper, unrighteously oppress, or tyranically prevent these small mills from the conduct of their business.

Disbursement of small mills cutting 2,136 feet per day, being approximate average production of 7,347 Southern small mills running full time.

	1 mill per day	7,347 mills per day	7,347 mills per year running 300 full days
1. Timber payments	$8.54	$62,743.38	$18,823,014.00
2. Labor disbursements	16.40	120,523.71	36,157,113.00
3. Gasoline and oil purchases	2.71	19,910.37	5,973,111.00
4. Feed purchases	1.07	7,861.29	235,838.70
5. Machinery, mill supplies and equipment purchases	1.02	7,493.94	2,248,182.00
6. Freight paid on shipments at average of $80 per carload	17.08	125,546.00	37,664,400.00
Total	46.82	344,078.69	101,101,658.70

1. This stumpage is paid to the timber owner, which he uses to pay debts, deposit to savings accounts, and part of which he spends, but all of which enters the channels of business and swells its volume.

2. This sum is paid to the laborer, who generally spends it all in the purchase of food, clothing, manufactured goods, recreation, or amusement.

3. This sum is paid to the filling station and oil companies, supporting large forces in that field.

4. All of this, of course, goes to the merchant, who, in turn, buys from the farmer the grain and hay for making feed.

5. All of this goes to the jobber and machinery manufacturer who, in turn, pays most of it back to labor.

6. This large sum swells the shrunken revenues of railroads and steamship companies and contributes largely to their support, enabling them to employ their skilled and high-priced labor, purchase manufactured goods, and otherwise contribute to the general welfare of the Nation.

Many small mills are not running because they do not have sufficient orders. Many of them are not cutting as much as their quotas allowed by the association because they have not the orders. Unlike the large mills, they cannot run unless they can move their lumber as produced. They have not the money to carry inventories and pile up stocks. They must sell their lumber as they produce it. When this cannot be done they close down.

Small mills and many mills of medium capacity do not have the high overhead costs of the large mills, which include such cost elements as sales departments, timber departments, advertising, management and administration, insurance, office expense, interest, taxes on timber supply for a long period of years, and depreciation on expensive plant and equipment. The difference in cost as between the two types of mills, taking into account this overhead item, will be as much as $8 per thousand feet, or closely approximating that figure.

Furthermore, it is my firm conviction that the present fixed minimum price list would yield to large mills a substantial profit upon their average production. If the small-mill operator could sell his lumber on that list, certainly it would yield to him an exorbitant profit. If this statement is true, the present price list is not a cost-production set-up but rather a profit-protection machine, monopolistic in its effect and stifling to a recovery of building activity. It is unfair to the consumer and unjust to the manufacturer of lumber who has adjusted his business to a new cost basis in keeping with present values. Most small mills and mills of medium capacity are opposed to fixed prices. However, fixed prices are agreeable to those for whom we speak, provided they are not promulgated for the benefit of a few who have high investments in timber and plants, many of them made during the war period and after, when prices were high. It is questioned whether or not it is wise to protect those investments at the expense of the general public and those of the lumber-manufacturing industry who can produce on lower cost.

Small mills and mills of medium capacity in the South would like to have the Federal Government investigate these questions. Such an investigation would afford the upward of 7,000 small millmen in the South an opportunity to freely and frankly express themselves and would prove highly interesting and very enlightening. These small operators cannot spare the time or the money to visit Washington to tell their troubles. Furthermore, they lack the training for presenting the subject. The result is that they stay at home and permit the matter to smolder like a hidden fire until it bursts into flame, consuming and devastating.

My friends, in closing I want to say that I started life's work without a dollar in the world. I have had to go up against those blessed with riches and well-organized groups, both in business and in politics. And out of my experience I have developed a great desire to battle for the under dog. My record at home and my record in Congress has been along this line. The following poem expresses my sentiment:

THE UNDER DOG

I know that the world—that the great big world—
From the peasant up to the king.
Has a different tale from the tale I tell
And a different song to sing.

But for me, and I care not a single fig
If they say I'm wrong or I'm right;
I shall always go in for the weaker dog,
The under dog in the fight.

I know that the world—that the great big world—
Will never a moment stop
To see which dog may be in fault
But will shout for the dog on top.

But for me—I never will pause to ask
Which dog may be in the right;
For my heart will beat, while it beats at all,
For the under dog in the fight.

Perchance what I've said were better not said,
Or 'twere better I said it incog;
But with heart and with glass filled chock to the brim,
Here is luck to the bottom dog.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and place in the RECORD a few excerpts from letters, a telegram to General Johnson, and the letter that I wrote to these sawmills that Mr. Sheppard complained about.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read the third section of the bill.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer an amendment and to ask unanimous consent that this sentence in the bill be passed over until we come to the proper place to offer an amendment. The sentence I refer to is on page 9, line 9, "The term 'Commission' means the Federal Trade Commission." At the proper place in the bill I desire to offer an amendment striking out the words "Trade Commission" and inserting in lieu thereof "Stock Exchange Commission." I ask unanimous consent to pass over this sentence in the section until we come to the proper place in the bill on page 56.

Mr. BRITTEN. Reserving the right to object, this amendment will undoubtedly be the most important amendment to the bill and probably cause considerable debate.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman from North Carolina simply wishes to preserve his rights.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Would not this be the practical working-out of it? If the gentleman's amendment is adopted later on, there would be no trouble in going back and making this part of the bill conform to it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I see no difficulty about that, and the gentleman from North Carolina simply wants to preserve his rights.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read down to and including line 17, page 13.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H.R. 9323, the securities exchange bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—H.R. 9323

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who speak on the bill or on any amendment thereto may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker and fellow colleagues, I favor a measure that will render service to the people of the Nation, such as the act now before us, termed the "National Securities Exchange Act of 1934."

I favor a measure that will aid in regulating the stock exchanges of the Nation, because 99.99 percent of the people in the United States favor such measure.

I favor such a measure because the stock-exchange people and big business generally realize that they must have some set-up by which they can regulate their business so as to assure stability and restore confidence in the markets of the Nation as well as of the world.

The stock-exchange market and big financial groups of the Nation announced to the world in 1929 that they themselves were no longer able to control the business which they themselves built up. They themselves threw up their hands and said, "We have failed to keep these, our gigantic institutions, under control."

Along about October 1929 we see them seated around the table here and there throughout the country, pulling their hair and scratching their heads, trying to find a quick solution to keep the structure they had built from crashing down on them and on all the millions who had invested their money in these institutions. They saw these institutions tottering under the great boulder of mismanagement.

Like a great oncoming cyclone in our Middle West, the managers and directors of these institutions saw the catastrophe coming. They realized that the millions, yes, billions, of worthless securities and watered stock, which had no real value whatever, would drive to ruin not only millions of individuals but thousands of mills and factories and institutions. Yes; they realized that the soap-bubble bonds and securities that they had sold to the innocent little bankers and others throughout the Nation would be worthless as soon as the crash came. Realizing all this, they themselves gathered in under their wings as much of the safe and sound securities as they could and then stood at a safe distance from the explosion and watched the terrific catastrophe of November 1929.

Mr. Speaker, the bad management and the lack of national laws for regulating the institutions that existed prior to these fatal days of 1929 put more old men, helpless widows, and retired farmers and merchants into their graves in the 3 years following 1929 than the total number of brave American boys that lost their lives on the battlefields during the World War.

Thousands and tens of thousands of honest, hard-working, God-fearing men and women, who had saved a meager few thousands and had put their trust in these institutions and in the men of these institutions, were sent to the almshouses and the poorhouses, or were thrust upon the charity of friends or relatives, because of the lack of management of the stock markets and the supposed security markets of our country.

Mr. Speaker, I am not here to say what percentage of these multiplied millions of worthless securities that were floating in our markets in 1929 was worthless because of the loopholes in our laws that made it possible for highway robbery to exist within the law, or what percentage of these securities was worthless because of bad management on the part of the workers and directors of the institutions.

However, one thing we the Members of Congress do know; one thing the opponents of this bill—some of them sitting in the gallery today—very well know; one thing the helpless millions of splendid citizens who have lost their money in closed banks know; one thing we all know, and that is that a government that permits institutions to spring up within its own borders that can no longer be controlled is a government that needs adjustment to protect its interests and its citizens.

My friends, the Nation should come to the rescue of the millions who innocently lost their money in the closed banks. Just how it is best for the Nation to proceed to do this, no one yet knows. I hope that a measure that will meet with the approval of Congress and the administration will be passed so we can pay back these innocent depositors.

It was because of insincerity, bad management, carelessness, indifference, lack of laws that regulate, incompetence on the part of managers and directors that some 29 of the 36 banks in one of my counties, Fayette County, Pa., closed their doors prior to March 4, 1933. Yes; they closed their doors, never to open. Hundreds and thousands of men and women, hundreds and thousands of boys and girls and school children, and scores of charity institutions and welfare institutions had their money snatched from them, as a thief would snatch your pocketbook.

Mr. Speaker, are we going to sit idly by as a great Nation, as members of Congress of a great Nation, and say to our people that institutions which are eating out the very vitals of our Nation have grown to such proportions that we can no longer control them? I, for one, say, "No!" We can control, if we will, any and all the institutions in our country. We can control the banks so that the depositor will have safety; we can control the security markets of the Nation; we can control the stock exchanges of the Nation. My friends, if we are going to perpetuate the Jeffersonian principles embodied in our Constitution, we must regulate the management and manipulation of these institutions.

Then, again, I say, Government agencies must set up a procedure of regulations for these institutions, because big financial institutions and banking institutions demonstrated to us by both precept and example in 1929 that they could not control, regulate, and manage their own business.

I do not want to be misunderstood; I do not want to see a set-up in our banking institutions, for instance, that would make it possible for some group of know-nothing investigators or so-called "Government officials or experts" to go in and upset the workings or management of a mill, a factory, a mine, or a bank. That is not the intent or the purpose of this measure. The intent and the purpose of this measure is to take out of institutions that group of know-nothings and bad managers and keep them out.

Nevertheless, everybody now realizes that the group that has been managing and planning our social and economic set-ups for the last 12 or 15 years has been an utter failure. There is not a red-blooded American of 25 years of age under the sound of my voice that would not be ashamed to hand to our posterity the present social and economic fabric that we and those who had charge of the reins of Government before us are responsible for. Our grandfathers handed to our fathers practically no bonded indebtedness and financial hang-overs. Our fathers handed to us, who are now old enough to have the reins of Government in our hands, a very small mortgaged, or bonded, indebtedness. But, my friends, if we do not adjust this financial and economic structure of ours, we will hang about our children's necks, and our great-grandchildren's necks, the millstones of financial burden that will cause them to rightly point the finger of contempt at the pages of history that tell of us as unreliable and incapable managers of what was justly their heritage.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that among the most important matters of legislation affecting the economic welfare of this country, in my judgment, are:

First. Tariff legislation that will enable us to resume our trading with the rest of the world.

Second. Legislation that will give us an expansion of the currency wherein we will have an adequate but sound medium of exchange, and I believe this can best come about through remonetization of silver, which will give us a medium of exchange to trade with that part of the world that has only silver with which to purchase our products.

Third. The legislation as provided in the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, known as the "Fletcher-Rayburn bill", the object of which is to prohibit pure speculation in securities and commodities and to prohibit a creating of a false or misleading appearance of active trading in any security registered on the national stock exchange and prohibit transactions which involve no change in the beneficial ownership of such security.

While I believe it is proper to have legitimate markets for our agricultural products and other commodities, yet the welfare of the whole public should not rest upon the operations of the gamblers upon our stock and market exchanges. The farmer who has raised his products in the sweat of his brow has been at the mercy of these gamblers. This need of such legislation has been recognized for a long time, and the Fletcher-Rayburn bill endorsed by President Roosevelt is the first sincere step in the direction of eliminating these corrupt practices. Of course, this monster that has had this Nation by the throat these many years is not going to give up without a fight and a struggle. However, they are going to have a difficult time in obtaining any sympathy from the people of the country when it is revealed that from 1928 to and including 1933 the Wall Street brokers were making money to the tune of two thousand million dollars, while their customers lost sixty-five thousand million dollars. With the suggested tariff legislation, expansion of the currency, and proper stock-market legislation the depression can be cured, and agriculture, which must be prosperous if the rest of the country is to be prosperous, and business in general will again be put on their feet without any artificial stimulants in the form of processing taxes or regimentation.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, we have now arrived at the crossroads; and when we attempt to put into effect any new legislation, it will be necessary to "stop, look, and listen", and not only consider the particular accomplishment we expect to attain by the act before us, but also to heed what will be the effect of placing such legislation into operation upon the general business of the country. Last spring in rapid order we surrendered our legislative functions to a lot of commissions, which were clothed with all the powers necessary to legislate for us, and carry out measures which we defined in general terms, and upon which almost any construction these commissions desired to place could be made by them as there were very few limitations in the bills.

The result has been entirely contrary to our expectations, and would be fairly exemplified by the man who hit a drowning man on the head with a club in order to save him.

What we intended to do was to provide work for the unemployed; to do this it was necessary, among other things, to restore confidence so that business would resume its ordinary course; when we started our session, the public were ready to assist, as everyone realized the situation; but what happened was that when by a united revived spirit we were moving upward, the placing into operation of the legislation we passed caused so much trouble and confusion that our apparent advance was only for a short period, and again trade fell back under a cloud of misunderstanding and doubt and has not since then shown the material advance that has been evident in other nations who have not interfered in their national progress with strange cures and quack remedies.

Undoubtedly there are many things that need curing, but a sick patient cannot afford to chance playing with the cures and remedies; they should be reserved for people who imagine they are sick. What we now want is confidence that we can go ahead without any new doctrines to hinder our advancement; only such things as will assist that progress should be receiving our attention. This bill may be needed, and in ordinary times I would give it serious consideration; passage today means another halt in our progress of relieving unemployment, and I am not prepared to play with human misery any longer by placing a stumbling block in its way.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, the market panic of 1929, which supposedly precipitated the present depression, has all through the debate been treated as a cause rather than an effect. I cannot agree with that logic. First, let us remember that stock exchanges are but so much machinery by which the speculative fever of the Nation is registered. This machinery was but reflecting the hysteria and the desires that imbued our Nation immediately after the war. I contend and have always contended that the slaughter of 11,000,000 men, who were both producers and consumers in a well-integrated society, together with the $250,000,000,000 waste of the world's wealth and the overexpansion that took place in all lines of industry, business, and agriculture as an incident to the war, was the cause not only of the stock-market debacle of 1929 but of all the despair and distress that has been the lot of this and of all other nations during the last 5 years. Unless we shall witness another war of astronomical proportions, I do not anticipate another market crash such as that.

In that spirit, we might well put aside all prejudices and all vindictiveness in the consideration of the pending bill.

I have no personal interest in the stock market. I never bought or sold a share of stock in my existence. My sympathies would naturally be on the side that would seek to exercise the most rigid control over market operations in order to safeguard the public welfare of all present and future investors, but above all else, we as legislators must be most discriminating and careful, to see that the crusading zeal to reform something or someone does not defeat its own purpose and bring havoc upon the country.

To those who could see no good in the stock and commodity exchanges, let me quote from the language of United States Supreme Court Justice Holmes, in the celebrated Board of Trade case:

> The plaintiff's chamber of commerce is, in the first place, a great market, where through its 1,800 members, is transacted a large part of the grain and provision business of the world. Of course, in a modern market, contracts are not confined to sales for immediate delivery. People will endeavor to forecast the future and to make agreements according to their prophecy. Speculation of this kind by competent men is the self-adjustment of society to the probable. Its value is well known as a means of avoiding or mitigating catastrophes, equalizing prices, and providing for periods of want. It is true that the success of the strong induces imitation by the weak and that incompetent persons bring themselves to ruin by undertaking to speculate in their turn. But legislatures and courts, generally, have recognized that the natural evolutions of a complex society are to be touched only with a cautious hand, and that such coarse attempts at a remedy for the waste incident to every social function as a simple prohibition and laws to stop its being are harmful and vain. The court has upheld sales of stock for future delivery and the substitutions of parties provided for by rules of the Chicago Stock Exchange.

These words are from the mind of one of the world's most enlightened and socially minded jurists and are a sufficient answer to those who would entirely abolish the exchanges or who approach this question of control and regulation in a vindictive spirit.

No one will deny that there should be some form of regulation. Even the attorneys for the various exchanges who appeared before the committee made overt admissions of that fact. Most of the general debate was directed to the abuses of speculation and the excessive use of credit, but thus far, little has been said or made emphatic as to whether this is the proper bill to accomplish that purpose.

When the Securities Act of 1933 came before this body for consideration, I distinctly recall that much of the same argument was advanced in behalf of that bill that is now advanced in behalf of the pending measure. The reform phobia was in the air. Most of us not only voted for it but defended it later. We placed little credence in the prophecy that that act would curtail financing, would retard employment and hamper recovery. Hindsight is, of course, much easier than foresight, but we can see now that those prophecies have in part at least become realities. Financing in the capital or durable-goods industries for the fiscal year is only about 4 percent of what it was in the normal years from 1921 to 1929, and unemployment in such durable-goods industries is about 8,000,000 persons. Money is available for investment in such industries so that despairing, unemployed men might go back to work, but that Securities Act has, in truth and in fact, by its penal and civil liability provisions, frightened competent and skilled security men, and as a result there is stagnation. Now, we are considering a companion bill, and I propose to weigh every consideration carefully before I undertake by my vote to further impede the progress of recovery. I shall try not to permit the zeal of a reformer to becloud my best judgment and visit further punishment upon our unemployed in the form of stagnation in industry.

Let us assume, then, that control and regulation is needed and wanted. The incident questions which follow are these: Is this the proper kind of a bill? Does it go too far? Do we need it now? Might we invite disaster by further tinkering at this time?

In his opening statement on Monday the distinguished chairman of the committee mentioned the propaganda that accompanied the consideration of this bill in committee. The inference was that the speculators were trying to defeat or alter the provisions of the bill. That may or may not be true. In any event, I returned to my office to examine again the hundreds of letters and telegrams that were sent with respect to this measure. Some gave evidence of having been inspired by outside influences. In the main, however, the letters and telegrams were so well conceived, the subject matter so well presented, and the discussion of the merits of the first bill so well set forth as to evince a proper understanding of its basic purposes. It is amazing, too, to note that not a single message came to me in support of this bill. I know nothing of stock exchanges, but I do know something about the capabilities, the temper, the integrity, and the perception of my people; and I purpose to give every consideration to their wishes.

I have labored with this bill day after day and night after night. Everyone will concede that its language is technical, that it is difficult to follow in all its ramifications, that it would not be strange if different interpretations were placed upon its purport and meaning. Permit me, then, to present my objections to this bill in its present form and to what I am afraid might be its immediate effect.

Yesterday the Federal Reserve report of member banks, comprising about one half of the banking facilities of the country, showed a drop in commercial loans of 19 million. In the previous week, the drop was 75 million. Compare this successive 2 weeks' decrease with the previous 3 weeks in which an aggregate increase of 55 million in commercial loans was indicated. Everybody hoped that bank-credit expansion was on the way, but the losses of the last 2 weeks have entirely vitiated the gains of the previous 3 weeks.

In the light of the fact that there are now one and a half billion in excess reserves and that the immense gold reserves would permit credit expansion of unlimited proportions, this diminution of loans was estimated at $4,604,000,000 which is actually $99,000,000 less than a year ago. Loans on securities as of April 25 were $3,516,000,000, which is $122,000,000 less than 1 year ago. Remembering that 1 year ago the Nation was at its lowest ebb, the fact that all loans, including security loans, is around $100,000,000 less than at that time. The conclusion is obvious that in addition to the restrictions imposed by the F.D.I.C., the Banking Act, and other measures, there is a distinct fear and apprehension in the air which continues to freeze bank credit. This is singular enough in the light of the clamor that has been going up for weeks for legislation, such as the Glass bill or the credit industry bill to expand bank and investment credit.

Here we have a bill to do what? By its very language to control credit, to curtail the excessive use of credit, to offset what will be attempted later in some kind of credit measure, and the psychological effect on the Nation might be disquieting indeed. Has anyone advanced a reason why this particular bill should be enacted at this time? Is a boom at hand that needs curbing before it is born? By such measures as this that boom may die aborning. I wish I shared the optimism that foresees an immediate boom, particularly when relief rolls are heavier and unemployment greater than it has been at any time since last October. Conceding that there is an upward momentum in business, the stability of such momentum is precarious enough, and why imperil it by a bill that is overly drastic?

Section 5 of this bill provides in substance that exchanges must agree to comply with and agree to enforce compliance by its members with the provisions of this act, and "any amendments thereto and any rule or regulation made thereunder." Considering that the act carries a penalty of $10,000 or 2 years' imprisonment, or both, for an individual violation, and a maximum of $500,000 for a violation by an exchange, it is strange, indeed, that exchanges and individuals and corporations may become liable to the penal provisions of this bill as the result of rules and regulations made after its enactment by the Federal Trade Commission or the Federal Reserve Board. Business might well shudder at the future implications of such a measure.

Section 6 sets forth the loan-margin provision. In the first part of the section a yardstick is provided. Loans up to 55 percent of the current market price may be made; or the member of the exchange, dealer, or broker who operates through a member may elect the other provision, if it is higher, namely, 100 percent of the lowest market price of the security during the last 36 months, but not more than 75 percent of the current market price, the lowest market price for the last 36 months to be considered as the lowest market price since July 1, 1933. Now, note the next paragraph. It states that, notwithstanding the above provisions, the Federal Reserve Board may raise or lower as it may deem appropriate. If that be the case, why have a yardstick at all? Why have rigid margin requirements anyway, if they can be ignored or set aside by the Federal Reserve Board? If this is to be a flexible bill, why not exhibit consistency and eliminate all rigid margin requirements?

Paragraph (c) of the same section states that it shall be unlawful for a member of the exchange, or for a broker or dealer who transacts through a member, to arrange or extend credit to a customer on any registered security except in accordance with the prescribed rules and regulations. It excludes exempted securities, which include Government and State and municipal obligations. Now, subsection (2), when read in connection with the above context, makes it unlawful to extend or arrange customer credit without collateral, or on any collateral other than registered or exempted securities except as prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board; and the only discretionary power of the Board is to permit credits on other collateral for a limited time under specified conditions, or to permit it if such credit is not to be used for purchasing or carrying registered securities.

That language is rather involved, but as I interpret it, I see some rather dangerous implications. Taking out registered and exempted securities, there remain the unlisted securities. Bear in mind that there are only 788 securities registered on the New York exchange, perhaps 500 on the Chicago exchange, and in similar proportion on the other exchanges. Then what about the thousands of unlisted securities that corporations in your district and mine have issued? Apparently these securities cannot be used as collateral in brokerage transactions if the purpose is to carry or trade in listed securities. Apparently no credit can be extended by a member or by a broker or dealer operating through a member except in accordance with rules and regulations made by the Federal Reserve Board. What about the rights of the hundreds of investment houses who now operate as brokers and dealers under a code of fair practice? If they must be subject to the special rules and regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, you are placing in the hands of that Board a weapon by which they can ultimately exercise complete control over all unlisted corporate securities and ultimately concentrate security transactions in the hands of a few and, incidentally thereto, control and regiment all business in this country.

Section 8 of the bill deals with manipulation of security prices and rather meticulously sets out what would be false or misleading statements on the part of a dealer, broker, or member for the purpose of creating a misapprehension as to the market or to the price for a security. While some such provision is doubtless necessary, these and subsequent provisions induce the question as to just what advice a member, dealer, or broker might safely give to a client without laying himself open to possible charges that might invoke the penal provisions of the bill. While the prospect of blackmail suits may be remote, yet the possibility is there and carries with it that strange fear that will bring about a reluctance to give advice even on the soundest securities.

Paragraph (e) of section 10 directs the Commission to make a study of the feasibility of the complete divorcement of the functions of dealer and broker. The very fact that this direction is given to the Commission indicates that such report will be made back to Congress; and if the recommendation is consonant with the rest of the bill, it means that these functions will be divorced. There are hundreds of individuals and small firms all over the country who operate as dealers and brokers. They perform a very useful and necessary service. In the main they are citizens of repute and standing and quite competent to carry on these functions. They have heavy investments in their various establishments and employ a number of people. If and when these functions are divorced, you will find that these little dealer-brokers cannot carry on in only one capacity and maintain their establishments. It will mean the disintegration of these many establishments, more unemployment, without any particular gain for or improvement in the safety or welfare of the average investor. Yet the way to this disastrous consequence is pointed out, and I assume that in due time it will be followed.

Paragraph (e) of section 11 provides that the Commission "may" by rules and regulations permit listed securities to be registered before July 1, 1935, without complying with the other provisions of the section relating to the registration of securities. Why should not this language be changed from "may" to "shall"? Why permit such uncertainty with respect to listed securities to rest in the whims and caprices of the Commission? To insist on compliance with the other provisions of that section means expense, time, and legal fees. It means uncertainty and confusion. It means that the burden of proof might be placed upon the corporation rather than upon the Commission. I see no reason why there should not be a virtual automatic registration of listed securities in the absence of some affirmative showing on the part of the Commission.

Section 13 dealing with proxies would make it unlawful to solicit proxies with respect to any registered security except in conformity with such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe. There is little doubt that there has been grave abuse of this authority to solicit proxies and the use of such proxies for manipulation. The American Tobacco Co. case is a historic example. These abuses should be curbed, but why subject corporations and their officers to the uncertainty of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe, in what they deem to be the public interest. Is it asking too much to have these matters definitely set out in the law so that the business and industry of the country know their rights instead of being at the mercy of any rule or regulation that a Commission may wish to prescribe. Incidentally, these rules and regulations by the language of the act have all the force and authority of law, and a violation thereof constitutes a penal offense. This Congress has passed much legislation of a similar character, and it is time that a halt be called. If the Congress was properly charged with abdicating its legislative functions in previous measures, how much more true that charge will be if and when this bill passes.

I should not feel disposed to object to section 15 of the bill if it applied only to officers and directors of the issuer of a security, because such officers and directors are in the position of offerors to the investing public. But the section goes much further. It provides that every person who is, directly or indirectly, the beneficial holder of 5 percent or more of any class of security must file with the exchange, within 10 days after he becomes the holder or owner of such beneficial interest, a statement showing his interest and his holdings. A duplicate must be filed with the Commission.

That is not all. Within 10 days after the end of every calendar month, he must file a similar statement, showing any changes in his holdings if any. Let us take a concrete example. On smaller exchanges, it is quite common to list small issues. In the case of an issue of one half million dollars, the owner of 5 percent, or $25,000 worth of such securities must file a report every month, year in and year out that he is the owner of such securities. All information with respect to the entire issue has already been fully disclosed under the registration requirements; the records of the corporation are available; there can be no argument that income, dividend, or capital-stock taxes will be evaded, and it would seem that the Commission would be imposing an unnecessary burden and hardship upon the holders of only 5 percent of a class of securities. Had the amount been set at 20 percent, there might have been more logic about it, but as the section now stands, it can at best be but an intolerable burden, without serving any public interest.

Let me raise this point with respect to foreign securities. I understand that about 8 billion of foreign securities are listed on the exchanges of this country. Suppose the brokers, the issuers, and dealers refuse to register these securities and trading therein is reduced or suspended—you at once affect the marketability of those securities and by so doing might easily precipitate a disastrous decline and thereby penalize thousands of American investors. If and when this is done, do you really secure control over such foreign securities? Is there anything to prevent independent dealers from marketing such securities direct and thereby achieving a distinct advantage over our own securities?

The matter is brought sharply to mind by an advertisement which is clipped from April 8 edition of the New York Herald, which reads as follows:

> Union of Soviet Socialist Republics 7-percent gold bonds. The State bank of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics with a gold reserve in the note-issue department of $704,000,000 agrees to repurchase these bonds on demand of the holder at par and accrued interest at any time after 1 year from date of purchase. * * * Circular H-9 upon request. Soviet American Securities Corporation, 30 Broad Street, New York, Hanover 2-5332.

Nothing is said about exchanges. Nothing is said about being a listed security in this case. Apparently they operate direct to the customer. The language of section 29 is such that such transactions are not unlawful, inasmuch as it is not a transaction on any exchange, and it occurs to me that this but points out what may happen under a bill so drastic as this, namely, circumvention and bootlegging of securities.

Let me once more make my position clear on this measure. I believe that regulation and control is needed, and I shall vote to recommit this bill with instructions to report H.R. 8575, known as the "Bulwinkle bill." The fact is conceded by the exchanges themselves. There has, however, been no affirmative showing that so drastic a measure, which virtually vests control of all corporate enterprise in this country in the Federal Trade Commission is necessary. There has been no showing that it is necessary at this time. I am for regulation but not for strangulation. Above all else, as I survey the mounting relief rolls, the growing roster of unemployment, the fears and apprehensions of business, and the immediate response of the business and industrial fabric to the slightest prejudicial factors, I am constrained to vote against this bill out of fear. Not fear inspired by any stock-exchange propaganda, not fear of the consequences of my vote, but a self-inspired fear that a vote in behalf of this bill, at this time, may be the signal for further recessions in business, further declines in the market, further sympathetic declines in the grain market, and fear that more people will be added to the long and dispairing queues of unemployed.

The original stock-exchange regulation bill which was prepared as the result of the studies made by a commission appointed by Mr. Roper, the Secretary of Commerce in the present administration, seemed to be a most satisfactory bill. It contained everything necessary for a proper control and regulation of the exchanges and for the elimination of the current abuses in trading practice. It is evident from the discussion that has taken place during the last 4 days that that bill was not sufficiently drastic and that the committee, aided by Mr. Cohen and Mr. Corcoran, then perfected the present bill.

When this matter is finally concluded on the floor and the measures come to a vote, it will not be a case of voting for or against a measure to regulate and control exchanges. Rather, it will be a case of voting for or against one of two bills which seek to achieve that purpose—the one known as the "Bulwinkle bill", which will be offered under a motion to recommit the present bill to the committee with instructions to strike out all matter after the enacting clause and substitute the Bulwinkle bill; the other, the bill now under consideration.

I shall vote for the motion to recommit and to substitute the Bulwinkle bill. I shall vote against the pending measure because it will amount to a complete regimentation of corporate business in this country through the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Trade Commission.

It is a bit intriguing to reflect back on the debates and discussions that have occurred on the floor of this House during the Seventy-third Congress, in which the Federal Reserve System and the Federal Reserve Board have been attacked and maligned in no uncertain language. It has been characterized as a great strangling octopus. It has been the subject of impeachment resolutions. Its officers and directors have been pointed out as money changers, still operating in the temple, and who must be driven out under the legislative lash. All that seems now forgotten, and instead of curtailing the powers of the Board, this bill seeks to hand over to it complete authority to determine margins, credits, banking control, and everything else. I wonder how those who have been content to discharge their oratorical ammunition against the Federal Reserve Board and Federal Reserve System will vote on this bill. It only proves that fish may be fish one day and fowl the next, depending upon the point of view. All in all, it is a strange world.

LOANS TO INDUSTRY

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, the most important duty facing Congress before adjournment is to provide for loans to manufacturing industry. Unless this is done the depression will continue indefinitely. We have approximately 200,000 plants in the United States, producing under normal conditions $70,000,000,000 worth of manufactured products and paying over $12,000,000,000 in wages. Practically all the unemployment in the United States is due to the inability of these manufacturing industries to operate. This in turn is largely due to their lack of working capital, for the ordinary sources of credit have been dried up during the past 4 years. The banks have become liquid but have been afraid to loan, fearing a recurrence of the financial storm.

In justice to the banks, it should be stated they have a definite alibi in this situation. The policy of the Treasury, through the itinerant bank examiner, has been to insist that the banks be and remain liquid. Throughout the Nation bank examiners discourage and question loans to local industry. Thus they handicap the local bank in making loans to going concerns, upon whose operation the life of the various communities depend. This policy of the Treasury is, in my opinion, unwise and largely responsible for the inability of solvent industry to obtain seasonal and working capital.

NOTHING DONE FOR INDUSTRY

But the fact remains that nothing has been done for manufacturing industry, big and small, upon which economic recovery of the country depends. The condition of the farmer is largely due to the fact that the worker is without employment and unable to purchase the products of the farm. In addition to the inability to obtain credit through the ordinary sources, the Securities Act has prevented the sale of industrial securities. As a result solvent and efficient industry has been unable to obtain loans for operating purposes.

I believe that the Securities Act should be amended so that legitimate industry may find a ready market for its bonds and the sale of its stock. I am in thorough sympathy with the spirit of the Securities Act. I voted for it in the House but believe there should be some modification now so that the large industrialist can do his financing in this way.

This type of relief, however, will not aid the small industrialist. The usual avenues of credit being closed, he must necessarily rely upon some form of governmental loan. I desire to emphatically state that it should be a loan and not in any sense a gift.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT IS FOR IT

President Roosevelt recognizes the importance of relief to industry. It is a fair inference that he concurs in the proposition that the return to work of 10,000,000 citizens who are as yet unemployed is largely dependent upon this procedure. It is stated in the press that he has concurred in the plan of Senator GLASS, of Virginia, which would permit Reserve banks to make loans direct to industry and then only under extraordinary circumstances where the normal credit facilities were not available.

In my judgment this procedure and plan is utterly unworkable. It not only leaves us where we are now but, being an ostensible cure for the conditions existing, it complicates the passage of effective legislation.

I am definitely in favor of the plan suggested by Senator BARKLEY (Democrat), of Kentucky, who advocates giving the Reconstruction Finance Corporation almost unlimited authority to make 5-year loans to industry as a supplement to the Glass bill. I agree with Senator BARKLEY that the Glass bill is too hedged about with restrictions to meet the situation. It is undoubtedly true that big industries, which are national in their scope, could operate under the Glass bill, but the background of industry consists of the small concern upon which the people of the average community depend. They would have no place in the sun unless the plan proposed by Senator BARKLEY obtains. In other words, Congress at this time should pass legislation which will enable the Government itself to function where the banks are unable or unwilling to play their customary part. All of the present remedies and procedure intended to bring about recovery will absoluteily fail unless this is done.

PROSPERITY MUST COME THROUGH INDUSTRY

Industry is asked to bear the brunt of reestablishing prosperity through the medium of shorter hours and higher wages, yet the Government has to date allowed the sources of credit to dry up and has done nothing for the industrialist. No makeshift statute which will continue the existing situation or policy toward loans should be passed by Congress. I predict that Congress, before the present session adjourns, through a Federal instrumentality or other definite law, will prescribe a place where solvent industry may go and obtain necessary loans to carry on business. This procedure has been too long delayed and is in the interests not only of the industrialists who have builded America, but the toiler in the plants and his dependents, many of whom are now being carried on the welfare rolls or in nonproductive occupations.

THE NEW AND THE OLD M'LEOD BILLS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD to include a table in regard to the suspension of banks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 8479 was introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. McLEOD, of Michigan, March 5, 1934. According to the bill it has for its purpose:

(a) To promote resumption of industrial activity.

(b) Increase employment.

(c) Restore confidence by fulfillment of the implied guaranty by the United States Government of deposit safety in national banks.

It requires the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to purchase and acquire from receivers and/or conservators of closed banks which at the date of closing were members of the Federal Reserve System, all remaining assets of such banks. The amount paid shall be a sufficient amount to pay in full the deposit liability of such closed banks, and the funds shall be immediately disbursed to the depositors of such banks. It further provides that assessment liability of stockholders shall be construed an asset and purchased the same as other assets.

THE NEW BILL

The bill was amended by the Committee on Banking and Currency. All after the enacting clause was stricken out and another bill inserted, which provides:

First. That all banks, National, State, and private, which closed on or after January 1, 1930, shall be included.

Second. All deposits not in excess of $2,500 shall be paid.

This bill was favorably reported to the House April 12, 1934.

MOTION TO DISCHARGE THE RULES COMMITTEE

A motion has been placed on the Clerk's desk for the purpose of discharging the Committee on Rules from further consideration of a rule which has for its purpose the granting of a privileged status of the bill before the House. I am reliably informed that the Committee on Rules has never been requested by anyone to grant a hearing on the proposal, yet a petition is filed to discharge the committee. If 145 Members of the House sign the motion to discharge, the rule will come up for consideration on a second or fourth Monday, provided the 145 names were secured 7 legislative days prior thereto. If it comes up, the question will be, Shall the Rules Committee be discharged from further consideration of the rule?

If a majority vote to discharge the committee, then the question will be, Shall the rule be adopted? If a majority vote to adopt the rule, then it will be in order for someone to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill. If that motion carries, the bill will be considered under the special rule of the House and be subject to amendments.

BILL WITHOUT A GOOD PRINCIPLE

Since the bill does not embody a good principle I do not feel disposed to do anything in furtherance of its consideration. If it contained a single good principle, possibly it would be consistent for me to assist in the movement to get it to the floor in the hope that it might be amended. Its passage would set a very bad precedent, a precedent that could never be defended, and one that would doubtless cause our Government much trouble in the future.

WHY SAY JANUARY 1, 1930?

Why is it right for the Government to pay the losses of all depositors of banks since January 1, 1930, and not right to include 1929, 1928, or even back to 1920? Are not the depositors of banks that closed in 1929 entitled to just as much consideration as the ones of the banks that closed in 1930? I am inserting herewith a statement showing all bank suspensions since 1920. It was obtained from the office of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Banks suspended: The statistics of bank suspensions relate to banks closed to the public either temporarily or permanently, on account of financial difficulties, by order of supervisory authorities or directors of the bank. They do not include banks closed temporarily under special or "moratorium" holidays declared by civil authorities.

Deposits: Figures of deposits in banks suspended are as of date of suspension whenever data as of this date are available; otherwise they are as of the latest available call date prior to suspension.

WHY INCLUDE STATE AND PRIVATE BANKS?

Is there an implied guaranty by the United States Government to depositors of State and private banks? The Government had nothing to do with their operations. It had no more control over them than it did the building and loan companies, the life-insurance companies, the joint-stock land banks, the savings banks, or any other similar institution. If the losses are to be paid by the Government to the depositors of private banks or State banks the same fallacious arguments used to secure the passage of a law to pay them can be used in support of an argument to pay the losses by reason of the failure of all the other similar institutions, and over which the Government had just as much control as it had over State and private banks.

It is said that such payments will promote resumption of industrial activity. If Congress wants to give money away for that purpose why should the depositors in banks be the special beneficiaries? Such depositors of closed national banks are already getting from 60 percent to 70 percent of their deposits. Very few people are receiving more than that percentage on investments made at the same time the deposits were made. If the Government owed them a penny I would vote for its payment, but I first want to be shown that the Government is liable.

It is said that such payments will increase employment. Yes; possibly it will; but why should the Government pay money to depositors that it does not owe money to in order to increase employment? The money can be spent by the Government in many other ways that will be more helpful from the standpoint of increasing employment.

Therefore the only contention left is that the Government is liable by reason of an implied guaranty. Many of these banks failed because they were burglarized from the inside. The officials are serving time in penal institutions for the crimes. Has the Government an implied guaranty to pay the depositors in such cases? In many cases the officials of the banks, themselves depositors, loaned the money to themselves and lost it in various ways. There is not an implied guaranty in such a case or in any case that is affected by this bill. The adoption of such a policy, as pointed out by the Secretary of the Treasury, would be equal to guaranteeing deposits of the past, present, and future. There would be no need for the deposit insurance law.

WHO IS SUPPORTING THIS BILL?

This bill is supported by the Republican Members of the House. Very few Democrats are supporting it, and it is opposed by the President of the United States.

This bill represents a fair example of the kind of legislation that the Republicans have in mind to restore the country. It embodies the same kind of bad principles heretofore advocated by the Republican Party. Most of the money will go to the rich, if the McLeod bill in its original form becomes law; and, since we are dealing with property rights, there is no reason why the $32,000,000 depositor should not be paid, if the $2,500 depositor is paid on the theory that the Government is liable on an implied guaranty. The Republican Party is always willing to give the poor $1 to every $100 given to the rich.

COMPLIMENT TO MR. HOOVER

The Republican Members of the House are afforded an opportunity, through their advocacy of this legislation, to compliment their former chief, Mr. Hoover, and their former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, by pretending that depositors acted on their advice given in speeches against hoarding. These speeches were made in February and March 1932. Instead of deposits in banks increasing, the depositors of banks actually withdrew about $4,000,000,000 of their funds very shortly thereafter.

DISCRIMINATION IN HOUSE RESTAURANT

Pursuant to the provisions of House Resolution 236, the Chair appointed as members provided for therein the following Members of the House: Mr. MILLER, Mr. WALTER, Mr. WHITE, Mr. MCFADDEN, and Mr. MOYNIHAN of Illinois.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WOOD of Georgia, indefinitely, on account of death in family.

To Mr. FARLEY, for 5 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, indefinitely, on account of illness of his mother.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE SENATE

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Concurrent Resolution 14, and consider the same, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 14

Whereas H.R. 8617, the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1935, passed by the House on March 22, 1934, contains a provision on page 9, beginning in line 12 and extending down to and including a part of line 17, as follows:

"For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers of committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, $144,455"; and

Whereas the Senate adopted an amendment (no. 21) to the foregoing provision, as follows: On page 9, line 17, strike out "$144,455" and insert "$268,955, of which $150,000 shall be for the fiscal year 1934"; and

Whereas the conferees, in their report on the said bill, which was adopted by both Houses, recommended that the House recede from its disagreement to the said amendment and agree to the same, said amendment therefore not being subject to further amendment; and

Whereas the joint resolution (H.J.Res. 332) to provide appropriations to meet urgent needs in certain public services, and for other purposes, passed by the House on April 26, 1934, was amended by the Senate by inserting on page 1, after line 6, certain language, of which the following is a part:

"SENATE

"For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers of committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, fiscal year 1934, $150,000"; and

Whereas the foregoing amendment is a duplication of the appropriation of $150,000 for the fiscal year 1934, as contained in the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1935: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the event the Senate amendment to the foregoing joint resolution (H.J.Res. 332) is agreed to by the House of Representatives, and the existing differences of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill H.R. 8617, the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1935, are adjusted, the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, in the enrollment of the said bill, H.R. 8617, to insert, in lieu of the language contained in said Senate amendment no. 21, the following: "$118,955."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman please tell us what this means? It is a long and complicated resolution. Why is it necessary to do this at this time?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, when we passed the legislative appropriation bill we failed to place anything in it for the contingent fund of the Senate, for its investigating committees. The bill went over to the Senate, and they increased the appropriation by $150,000. That bill came back and went to conference, and we agreed to it, so that that $150,000 increase is now beyond the control of either the House or the Senate. When we passed the joint resolution the other day for the emergency appropriations, it went to the Senate and they amended that, and put the same $150,000 on that. So that if we pass them both, they will have twice as much as they need. Therefore, this amendment is to strike that from the legislative bill—the $150,000—and the next motion I make will be to approve it on the joint resolution that was passed the other day.

Mr. SNELL. If it goes through, unless we do something, we will have two appropriations for that full amount.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; for the same purpose.

Mr. SNELL. And you propose to strike out one of them, and that is the one on the legislative appropriation bill that has not yet become a law.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is it.

Mr. TABER. The Senate has already passed it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 332, to provide appropriations to meet urgent needs in certain public services, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 332, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, after line 6, insert:

"SENATE

"For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers of committees at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, fiscal year 1934, $150,000: Provided, That except in the case of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue taxation, no part of this appropriation shall be expended for services, personal, professional, or otherwise, in excess of the rate of $3,600 per annum: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for per diem and subsistence expenses except in accordance with the provisions of Subsistence Expense Act of 1926, approved June 3, 1926, as amended."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.
